The magnet which draws men into this enormous wilderness, where for hundreds of miles there is no sign of human life, where civilization has few outposts, is the rich mineral deposits, gold, silver, nickel, even platinum—riches which men reckon not in millions of dollars but in billions. And there are furs which for more than a century have found their way to civilization beyond the timber limit, down to New York and Buenos Aires and across the Atlantic to London, Paris, Berlin and Rome. The prospector and the trapper are familiar figures in the life of the frozen North. Their sagas have been sung in verse and prose and our Dan McGrews have become solid entities even in the hamlets of the temperate zones.

Suddenly, it seems, a miracle has been worked in their lives. The airplane, skimming the broad spaces, has vaulted in a few seconds the obstacles it once took them hours to pass. The icy fingers of the North have lost something of their death clutch. Even the frozen blasts seem to have lost a great deal of their merciless bite. Men still go out alone or in pairs into the vast solitudes, still struggle, still flirt with danger; but they go with greater assurance, with a sense of not having lost contact with their fellows out on the rim of a civilized country. A plane takes them to a definite spot, debarks them and their equipment and flies away.

Perhaps a group of prospectors is left out on location for several months. They go out into the unknown with the comforting assurance that at least once a month the plane will come flying in great circles overhead to see if they are all right, to land perhaps on a signal to take them to another region a hundred miles away—in less than an hour—or to take a sick man back to the base, or to collect some specimen ores for the assay office a thousand miles away. They are, in a measure, always in touch with their bases; always they are the particular charge of a group of men who span hundreds of miles to see to their welfare.

What is true of the prospector is true of the trapper. Planes are not used to the same extent to take them out to inaccessible locations. The trapper has no great fortune to back up his trapping. He is one of the most individualistic of men. He may go off with a companion for the Winter, but he often goes out alone. If in the Spring he fails to return, other men back at the trading post will ask, "Wonder what happened to Jake?" And the answer will probably be a shake of the head. Jake may have been frozen to death and the world may never be sure of his fate. But as a rule Jake returns with the Spring and his furs. Having traded them in, he spends an idle Summer, most likely gambling his small winnings away, and with the approach of Winter he goes off into the wilds with his grub stake and is lost to all human knowledge for another long, dreary season.

Now comes the airplane to give him a better market and better remuneration for his trapping. It used to take months for furs to get to their markets from the North. The route was by ship either through Hudson or Bering Straits. The furs arrived in Summer and were thrown upon the market at a price much below what they might have fetched. Now the trapper finds that he has a market in the Winter and higher prices for his furs, for the airplane is beginning to carry them south over the wintry terrain to the railheads and a white fox that may have been a wild animal in October is adorning the evening wrap of a débutante in New York by January.

But it is to the prospectors, backed by the millions of big mining companies, that the airplane is the most valuable ally. What this man-carrying messenger of the skies means to the prospector is perhaps best illustrated in the odyssey of a group of prospectors who left Edmonton a few years ago to prospect in the region of the Coppermine River, beyond the fringe of the Arctic Circle. As soon as the snow was gone the party left Edmonton and pushed north to the Great Slave Lake. Here they took to birchbark canoes and made their way laboriously along the southern shore from Fort Resolution to the mouth of the Mackenzie River.

For several hundred miles they paddled, until they reached Fort Norman. Then making their way to the Great Bear Lake, they crossed the 200 miles of water to the Coppermine River, more than 1,000 miles north of Edmonton as the crow flies. By that time Winter had again set in and the prospectors had nothing to do but to settle down and await the coming of Spring.

The following year, when the snow had once again fled, they went about their prospecting. By the time they were through Winter had again descended and the party was compelled to settle down once more for the long cold months between September and May, until they could set out for the return journey. They reached Edmonton again as Winter once more was setting in, after an absence of nearly three years.

AIRPLANES now carry prospectors from the railhead at McMurray on the Athabaska River, not far north of Edmonton, to the Coppermine River region in an easy two days of flying. Two days against three years! Hundreds of thousands of dollars saved. Men transported in luxury instead of in hardship. Here the truth of the adage that time means money is blatantly proved.

Despite the fact that landing grounds are readily accessible, the carrying of prospectors is not without its dangers. One has only to remember that a crash out in the wilds, even if nobody is hurt, is very much more serious than it would be in civilized parts. Frequently there is nothing to do but walk out—sometimes a very long walk—or wait until another plane flying overhead can be signaled and the damage either repaired or the party taken off and the cracked-up plane abandoned. While crashes even of a minor nature are not likely, they inevitably do happen. The cold in Winter is something to be reckoned with when the temperature drops to 60 below zero. Prospectors are not as a rule flown in this season, of course, but there is a regular air line which extends north from McMurray up to Mackenzie Bay on the lapel of the Arctic Sea. Yet, even in Sum-

LOOKING BACK AT OLD COLONIAL ROOMS

Their Charm Renewed In Reproductions Of Fine Pieces Made Today

A Colonial Room From Mount Pleasant, Which May Be Seen in Fairmount Park Museum, Philadelphia.

By WALTER RENDELL STOREY

THE Colonial architectural and decorative background is nearer to us today because of the interest in furniture of the past than it has been for a hundred years. With museums recreating rooms, historical societies reconstructing old houses and the antiquarian salvaging furnishings, no one need lack for authentic information on how the homes of a century and a half ago appeared. Most significant in this revitalization of the past is the growing number of authentic reproductions of the furniture. While it is true that the creating of fine original designs in furniture is a greater test of the artistry of an age than the making of copies of antiques, it is also true that no age without taste can reproduce in an effective way fine furniture designs. The growing appreciation of the good design of earlier days has had much to do with the fine reproductions now being made.

Contributing to this popular education as well as to enjoyment of the old, a series of half a dozen rooms has just been opened at Wanamaker's, where in interiors reproduced from famous Colonial homes are furnishings which not only reproduce authentic Colonial models but in some cases are copies of the furniture of the original room.

While such beautiful backgrounds are not found in every home today, it is worth while to study, for example, the relationship between a mahogany secretary desk with its top carved in the form of a "broken pediment" and a similar motif employed in the overdoor woodwork of a room of the same period. This is the room from Mount Pleasant, a famous Colonial mansion built about 1761 in Philadelphia and called by John Adams "the most elegant seat in Pennsylvania." One notes that the walls and woodwork are a deep fawn color, for, contrary to popular belief, Colonial interiors were not always white or cream. The Chippendale furniture of the room perhaps was made by that group of Philadelphia cabinet-makers whose work was so well done that some of their products cannot be told from English examples.

Much earlier in its architectural details, although actually built in 1750, is the charming interior from Somerset County, Md. This is known as the Oriole Room and is now in the American Wing of the Metropolitan Museum. It is fairly representative of the type of manor house interior of the South of that day. The mantelpiece has features of a more recent date—doubtless it replaced an earlier mantel of more generous proportions and without a shelf. The soft green of walls and woodwork affords a most pleasing color contrast with the mellow mahogany furniture and the old patterns employed in the window curtains and in the chair upholstery. It is not chance that has harmonized the various decorative materials in this room, but rather the artistic relating of fabric to wood and wall color to carpet throughout the eighteenth century.

In this panorama of historic American interiors it is appropriate that there should be included an example of early Republic rooms and also some of the work of a great American craftsman. In the Derby room reproduced from the Ezekiel Derby mansion of Salem—the original is now in the Fairmount Museum in Philadelphia—the decorative mode that we know as Adam is reflected and there is also shown the work of Samuel McIntire, the famous wood carver of Salem. Another name great in early annals is that of the architect of the house, Charles Bullfinch, who designed the Boston State House. In this interior, contrasted with the other two, one notes the simplifying of the overdoor woodwork and frame and the elimination of all paneling. The overdoor carvings as well as the simply designed mantel were by McIntire. Appropriately, some of the furniture shows the classic lines that Robert Adam incorporated in his chairs and tables and Sheraton also often employed.

The other three interiors suggest simpler homes, although the Potts house from Valley Forge, from which one of the bed chambers is reproduced, possessed the elegant simplicity of the section and period. As was the custom in 1760 when the house was constructed, the end of the room having the fireplace was completely paneled, although the other walls were white plaster. As "Washington's Headquarters," the house at Valley Forge is now a museum with many of the rooms restored to their original appearance.

Another room—a bedroom from the famous Webb house at Wethersfield, Conn., is typical of Connecticut architecture of the period. Here lived in 1776-1777 Nathaniel Webb, an aide-de-camp on Washington's staff, and here Washington and Lafayette developed their plans for the Yorktown campaign. The paneling at the end of the room is in pine and provides the appropriate suggestion and background for the reproductions of pine and maple of which so many pieces of furniture were made by Connecticut craftsmen of that day. Hand-blocked prints from old East Indian fabrics adorn the windows and an Indian print of the popular Tree of Life pattern fittingly ornaments the wall.

Even more in the pine and maple era is the kitchen from the Millbach house near Lebanon, Pa. This Pennsylvania-German interior, with its rafters and its walls paneled with vertical unpainted boards, suggests the rugged charm found in furniture inspired by this section of the Colonies. In this room as in the others, one discovers no pedantic striving for furniture of just one period. As no doubt was found in the homes of those early days, a bedroom or a living room had furniture suggesting the past as well as its present. In reproductions available today a wide choice is given the home decorator to achieve an individual effect through selection of pieces that are decoratively akin.

AMONG the last of home furnishings to be styled with the contemporary interior are bookbindings. The relation of books to the room in which they are placed was achieved in the past generally with rich deep reds, blues and greens of morocco leathers harmonizing with the oak or walnut paneling or reflected in the colors of wall papers or upholstery fabrics. But with the introduction of the modern fashion of interior decoration and the use of silver, bright colors and striking contrasts of hues, bindings had to be restyled.

Other factors not considered before have also had their effect in developing the new fashion in bookbindings. Books for children, for instance, must now be as attractive as those of adults. Not widely known but very important is also the movement among librarians of public libraries to substitute gay colors for the former dull hues of library bindings—a change that is gradually transforming drab shelves of public libraries into rows of multicolored book backs.

In the modern decoration of the outside of a book, the straight line seems to predominate. This is developed in right angles and acute angles or in bands of contrasting widths crossing the covers from side to side. For no longer is one side of a book considered in the design; the two covers as well as the narrow back of the volume are embraced in the unity of pattern. French binding design early showed this modern style in the decoration of book covers. Examples that have come over, such as some recently on display at the B. Altman

Another new theory of decoration of book bindings is that in a set of books the backs may be treated as a background for a unified pattern. Such a treatment is evident on the thirteen volumes of Marcel Proust's "Recherche au Temps Perdu." In these books the Parisian designer, Paul Bonet, has made the lettering of the title extend over the backs of all the volumes, together with a design of graduated bars of leather in contrasting colors, placed horizontally. Each volume of the set may easily be put in its proper order by following the design of bands and masses.

WHILE the modern mode is supposed to reflect the machine age in which we live, these French bindings were hand made just as books have been bound for hundreds of years. It has remained for the books bound in quantity to put these theories of design to the real test. For quantity production today many methods and materials unknown to the past are employed. The development of book cloths—in itself an effort to find a durable substitute for the traditional leather—has resulted in materials that have remarkable wear-resisting qualities. Special types of coated paper, enameled cloth and lacquered fabrics, synthetically developed by the chemist working with the weaver, are a few of the latest materials with which the modern designer of book coverings must work.

This entire revolution in materials is accompanied by equally new methods of impressing a design on the covers of a book. To the hand tools with which the traditional leather cover was incised and engraved have been added new methods of off-set printing, lithography, printed water-color effects, automatic gold stamping devices, colored foil decorations and embossed surfaces stamped by steel dies capable of ornamenting 10,000 or 12,000 copies a day.

One of the most interesting illustrations of a definitely modern design developed out of the methods of quantity production in binding was exhibited in the nursery created by Eugene Schoen at the display last Summer of modern interiors in the Metropolitan Museum. Here a set of books designed by the styling studio of the E. I. du Pont de Nemours Company followed the theory that the backs should be treated as the background for a general design. In these volumes of a reference work for children the black and silver binding is developed with dies that give various textures to the surface as well as impressing a rectangular ornamentation of straight lines.

But this modern appeal of color and new pattern is not confined to books fresh from the publisher's bindery. In the shelves of the public libraries there have now appeared books in orange, green or in gayly flowered chintz patterns. These are volumes which just yesterday would have been rebound when the first bindings wore out in the traditional dull red or brown. Not all libraries have yet adopted this new chromatic scheme for their rebound volumes, but in some branches of the New York Public Library the long rows of fiction and non-fiction are beginning to be enlivened by gayly chromatic touches.

This revolution, for which Miss Rose G. Murray, supervisor of binding of the library, has been largely responsible, has both a decorative and a utilitarian purpose. Books encased in gay colors and attractive fabrics are more eagerly taken out than the more somberly bound volumes. By carefully designing the bindings the cost, according to Miss Murray, is not higher than for the traditional and less attractive kinds.

It is really this need for keeping costs down that has apparently had a great deal to do with the type of design Miss Murray has developed. Ornamentation of book covers has been in the past mainly a question of elaborate tooling; or at least a plain cover depended largely on a design stamped in gold. In some of these new bindings, which range from morocco leather and buckram to glazed chintz and tapestry, color is employed for its effect alone. By an ingenious method of inlaying, or by using a contrasting color of binding material such as a band across the background, various original and striking effects are obtained.

It is interesting to note that in these broad bands of contrasting cover materials the limitations of the binding process are made to serve the type of design. Thus the band may extend diagonally from corner to corner of the two covers, crossing the back of the book—a simple way of bringing contrasting color to the three sides. This straight line division rather than a complicated curve is imposed by the necessity of keeping the binding method simple, but the result is a directness of pattern that is strikingly decorative.

THE FABIANS CONQUER BRITAIN FOR LABOR

ranks of the civil service and men with independent incomes. To many Continentals it is a mystery how such people can identify themselves openly with a Socialist movement without suffering socially or professionally. But in England they can and do. Their exclusiveness does not prevent their cooperating with the trade unions and the Labor party—of which the Fabian Society is a constituent part.

For the Labor party is not an exclusively working-class party. It addresses itself to "producers by hand and brain," and has thousands of middle-class members. Consequently it has at its service a good share of the intelligence of the nation. Numerous Liberals have gone over to the Labor party in recent years, notably the late Lord Haldane, Lord Arnold, Wedgwood Benn, Sir William Jowitt, Lieut. Commander Kenworthy and Arthur Ponsonby; and in Lady Cynthia Mosley and Oliver Baldwin, son of the Conservative leader, Labor has won recruits even from Tory families.

In no other country is there anything like the Fabian Society, a middle-class organization led by some of the most gifted writers and speakers in the land, on the one hand allying itself with working-class Socialist movements, on the other hand "permeating the Liberals" and making converts among members of its own class. But in no other country is there so much tolerance and flexibility in politics, combined with rigid social traditions.

JEWELS

Collectors and others who are perhaps more interested in Jewels as an accessory to dress and modern beauty may be impressed with the brooch illustrated. It is a rare example of the exquisite but rather quaint character of early 17th Century jewelry. But quite regardless of the reason which might actuate the acquirement of jewels whether to grace a collection or to find usage as feminine adornment readers of the Saturday Antiques and Interior Decorations Section of The Sun will occasionally find them delightfully discussed.

IN OLD KNOXVILLE MARKET

Mountain People of Strange Old-Fashioned Ways Come There to Gossip and to Trade

By ROSA NAOMI SCOTT

ONE short block from Hope's clock in Knoxville, Tenn.—the hub of the city—you get an amazing glimpse of two long lines of vegetable-filled trucks, wagons and rusty automobiles that make Market Square. In a city overhung with quaint atmosphere and in its picturesqueness a monument to the ease of settled ways, nothing is more characteristic. "We've always lived here" might almost be the slogan of Knoxville, whether of citizens or public places, and this old square with its handsome brick building, occupying the choicest business section, joins in upholding it. Knoxville has had its market 113 years.

The market folk might be their own forefathers who drove the Redcoats from King's Mountain, and the Redskins from East Tennessee. Women in old-time starched percales, ankle length, some with hats, others hatless and with hair skinned back to biscuit knots; and men in unashamed "galluses" and beards, stand by their naked vegetables with the independence of Scotch bargainers, as though saying, "Take it or leave it." The men's store clothes or overalls are wrinkled and spotty, but they are worn complacently. The most primitive, however, won't pose for the camera. Only by a visit to Market Square on a Saturday can one get a glimpse of them.

Their talk is more arresting than their appearance. There is an exhilaration in it, a combination of chatting of a county fair, circus day, and a closing-out sale. Through it run scraps of greetings and side talk.

"Hello, Andy! How's Mandy?"

"She's tol-abul."

One woman who has clutched another in sudden recognition, between two trucks, is explaining, "No, he lives in the knobs, but Deller an' her man lives——"

"Turn hit clar round an hit sharpens scissors!" interrupts a spieler for a versatile can-opener. We are left forever ignorant of where Deller and her man lives.

"This old town's a plumb sight!" * * *

"Say, though, I seen somethin' here last night 'at looked good to me!" * * *

"Maybe you want to sharpen old shears you got round the house;" the spieler's crowd now blocks the pavement. "Two strokes puts a sampler-edge on it. You take and draw a knife through * * * in a manner like that!"

A woman perched on a wagon holds up a sizable hand mirror to powder her sun-blistered nose. No two by two mirror for her.

"Don't you hate to see a body like that?" she asks scornfully.

"Hit's a ruination!" her companion agrees vehemently.

"I'm fer ever'body gittin' all they kin," a woman indicates her produce. "Ef hit's mine and they don't want to pay, they kin jest walk on."

You notice customers visiting, laughing with the vendors, evidently old friends. Yet these vendors judge their customers critically.

"Whom do you sell to?" you ask a woman selling dahlias.

She looks like an antique rag doll, but her answer is pat. Her tone is confidential. "Common class of people, lady. Them as can't buy at——"

She mentioned the best florist in the city. How ruffled her customers of knee frocks and cloche hats would be if they knew this farm saleswoman pigeonholed them as "common class!"

You notice these merchants cull specked fruits and vegetables from their measures before the customer speaks of it. At a wagon a woman demurs about the green beans she is receiving. Instantly the countryman weighs them on the scales that dangle above his display. The triumph of his air, the outstretched hand of the buyer assures you the scales settled the matter in favor of the merchant. They are fair, too, to each other about parking space at the curb. First come first served is the law of the curb market, but you are told "We let other folks' places alone and keep to our'n, if so be we kin."

A woman with hair strained back and old-fashioned spectacles has a grim strength in her face that attracts you.

"Settin' here's not all of hit," she tells you. "Gittin' up the load's the work. After I git home I'll bunch flowers till 9 o'clock. My sister will come tomorrow. We sell here till Christmas."

"Then don't you miss sitting here in the market?"

"Miss the money."

"Is that all you miss?" The questioner presses her.

"Yes." A lift of Scotch humor breaks the deep lines of her face. She laughs like a girl, but she will not admit she likes the Square.

These are good salesmen. "Roastin' years fresh out'n the patch," is said with unerring instinct at the crucial moment to stop a possible purchaser. They exhibit produce attractively in the cramped space of a wagon or truck end, let down as a counter. The green corn is slit to show milky grains; green peppers glisten, eggs are snowy white, and butter is in creamery paper.

Their knack of trading, honesty and humor were made in Scotland. Their ancestors came from Scotland and their economy is equally Scotch. Often it takes a week to sell their loads and they spend nights in town. But rarely do they pay for a bed! They sleep in their trucks or in store entrances. Late in the evening you can see their cots and bedding spread out.

SHARPLY detailed pictures stand out. A covered wagon—the pioneer wagon to a T—arrests you, and a wagon with a huge umbrella over it. A woman with hair that is still her glory, done in a clumsy knot, does a brisk business with the occasional buyer. A tiny old woman sleeps sitting by a truck, her head carefully propped on her wagon. A rattle-trap automobile with bottles of honey has a guardian so bent and odd that if fitted with a broomstick she might fly back to her hills. Instead she hops about cheerily, selling—mistress of her own business.

There are minstrels on quaint old Market Square. All day a blind mountaineer with flaxen hair and a guitar walks slowly down the market sidewalk, keeping close to the walls of the stores. He sings wistful hymns, or occasionally an old English ballad that has gained a novel twist by centuries in the Appalachians. He is not incongruous in the welter of flowers and vegetables and bargaining. He is of and with his kind.

Another minstrel, a little boy in a khaki suit, with a moving childish voice tramps the pavement, too. A brother, hardly older, moves along beside to give aid if necessary. As the little blind boy walks bravely forward, in his utter blackness, lifting his small clear song, the women in the market place are swept with an electric impulse of giving.

In Autumn, chinkapins, chestnuts, home-made hominy and pumpkins then fill the market. Later the mountaineers come down for Christmas with lumbering wagons of holly, glistening mistletoe, wild red berries and galax leaves. Lank and gaunt they stare at the towering Christmas tree on the square. But the charm of the old country's firesides, of snapping wood, the magic of aromatic Christmas cedars and hemlocks cling to these wagons and their gray, raw wardens from the hills.

SHIPBUILDING IN FROM SEA

IN the early days of New England shipbuilding small fishing and coasting craft were occasionally built in "cradles" two or three miles inland, near the timber supply, and later hauled over Winter snows by oxen to tidewater. Those primitive artisans worked everything they needed out of the raw material—keel, stem and stern posts, knees, timbers, planking and masts.

The strangest example of one of these "long-distance" launchings is found in the records and traditions of the little Maine town of Lisbon Falls. It is approximately twenty miles thence to deep water—where the Androscoggin River below Brunswick empties into Merrymeeting Bay, now celebrated for its duck shooting.

Since 1865 Lisbon Falls has been the home of a large and prosperous woolen manufactory, its chief industry. The late Frank Munsey lived there for a while, his father, Andrew C. Munsey, conducting a boarding-house for mill operatives. Then, too, the village has as a near-by background the towering sandhills of Shiloh and the disintegrating temple where once "Elijah" Sanford ruled with mysterious éclat.

It was a century ago this Fall that John Godfrey, a man of resolution and imagination, decided to build a ship there. He laid the keel where now a part of the great woolen mill plant stands. The hull was fashioned inside a big cradle which would function much like the sled of a Colossus when it came time to haul the finished product over the snow to salt water.

In those days nearly every farmer had a tie-up full of stout oxen, and "haulings" were quite common. Frequently barns were moved, and houses, once even a church—but never before a ship! And the distance! Here, indeed, was a prodigious feat that loosened the tongues of the country folk for miles around. At last came the day of the start.

HISTORY records that there were fifty yoke of broad-chested bovines hitched to the cable chains. An ingenious rig permitted the heavy "tow-rope" to lie on the ground when the cattle were resting. It would have been a weight too heavy even for their sturdy shoulders to bear continuously. The word was given, "Every man to his team."

Imagination only may inject the proper "Whoa Hi-i-i-sh" and "Gee Buck, gosh darn ye!" where they belong in this narrative, yet they were doubtless the expletives in frequent use. At an old barn, midway between the village and the launching point, the odd caravan was to rest and bivouac.

Baked beans and hot coffee were served. The oxen were rubbed down and fed for the night. Out of doors great bonfires were kindled. The builder broached a barrel of Medford rum. The villagers regarded the exploit as a huge lark.

But the entourage moved promptly again at daybreak. By noon the vessel was safely at the shore, where she was jacked up and made ready for launching in the Spring. That occasion, too, passed without untoward incident, and while history ends there no one has reason, despite her bucolic birth, to doubt the seaworthiness of the Lizzie of Lisbon Falls.

The remote little manufacturing village is beyond even the "smell" of the salty sea. When John Godfrey laid his keel his was a community of agriculturists, not ship carpenters, lacking even the tradition of deep water. Considering the great distance the vessel was hauled, this launching is said to have been without a parellel in the history of New England shipbuilding.

NEW STYLE AMERICAN SOLDIER

His Stiff Military Attitude Has Gone and He Looks Like a Student Learning a Trade

By ROBERT GINSBURGH

AFTER experimenting for more than ten years, the regular army of the United States now has brought out its latest model of soldier. He is the natural evolution out of the many types that preceded him, but in appearance, in his attitude toward his profession and toward those who support him, and in his training and equipment he is totally different. In particular does he differ from that professional soldier of early 1917, who had just emerged from the cactus and mesquite of Northern Mexico after his fruitless chase of the notorious bandit, Pancho Villa, to assume the responsibility of raising, training, organizing and equipping for overseas service an army of millions.

He has lost all trace of the Prussian influence which has dominated the theory of his training since the days of his earliest drill master, Baron von Steuben, who had come from the court of Frederick the Great to inculcate discipline in the ranks of the ragged Continentals.

The transformation has not taken place without some misgivings. A vociferous minority, seldom heard beyond the walls of the officers' clubs at various army posts, insists that the change is all for the worst.

"Give us the old two-fisted, square-shooting, hard-riding, hard-boiled old regular instead of the new breed of soldier," they plead. "He was not always sober and his like was seldom found in Sunday school. He was not much on book learning, but when it came to tackling the field or getting a job done he had it all over the men we get now. There are too many 'kids' enlisting now; and they don't stay in the service long enough to learn anything about the military game. They use the army to learn every trade but that of the professional soldier, and when they think they know enough they want to go home and get another job."

The surest evidence of the change may be noted in the 1929 styles of uniform. Clothes do a great deal to make the man in a military organization and to give the character to the wearer that the designer desires to carry out. The War Department has adopted the type of clothes that fits best the spirit of the soldier of today.

Gone is the stiffness in bearing and haughtiness of expression which the old clothes of a dozen years ago engendered. The choker stand-up collar has been removed. The neck of the tunic is now open, giving him a chance to move his head more freely and to look in some other direction besides the front.

A CIVILIAN point of view, too, has crept into his attitude toward his work. While there are still a number who enlist to satisfy a craving for romance or travel, thousands enter the regular army every year—many of them brought to the recruiting station by their parents—to acquire something which will help them adjust themselves to their economic environment after their "hitch with the colors."

While overseas garrisons are still maintained, the primary mission of the regular army has become the furnishing of instructors for the National Guard, the Organized Reserves, the Citizens Military Training Camps and the military units at the schools and colleges.

Service in the large cities has complicated the economic aspects of army life. A soldier gets the same pay whether he is stationed at isolated Fort Meade, S. D., or at Governors Island, in the harbor of New York. Consequently, outside sources of income are necessary for contentment on an assignment with a National Guard or college unit in a large community where the cost of living is high.

Proximity to civilian life is also proving a drain on the army's most promising material. The opportunities for better paying pobs often present themselves and many men, particularly officers, leave the service for that reasop.

Schools, incidentally, have become the dominant interest in the modern army. The science of war has become so complicated that only those with intensive military education can hope to succeed now. Whereas in former days the dragoon sprang into his saddle, threw a carbine over his shoulder and took to the field, the cavalryman of today has not only his horse and his rifle but his machine-guns, mules and armored cars. Frequently he has a whole motorcade to transport his animals and anti-aircraft weapons.

The doughboy, the rough-and-tumble, hand-to-hand fighter, who depended on his brute strength and the sharp edge of his bayonet, now computes complicated firing data, using trigonometrical formulae and bulky range tables for the indirect laying of his one-pounder guns, while the dashing field artilleryman, who galloped into position and opened the fire of his three-inch guns the moment he dropped the trails of his pieces, has added cumbersome, slow-moving tractors to his equipment and burdened himself with telephone and radio switchboards.

To the older officer there has been no school like the practical field of application on the frontier to train men. The pioneering spirit of the army today, however, has not disappeared but merely assumed a new form. New fields of scientific research in the realm of the plane and radio are calling to the younger men in the service and they are facing dangers with the same intrepidity that their predecessors showed in fighting Indians or bands of Filipino guerrilas. Old standards are being discarded for new, and it is impossible to foretell whether the present type of soldier is a passing phase in American military history or the model of tomorrow.

AS AN ACTOR VIEWS THE AUDIENCE

ing to be made into anything necessary for the entertainment, if the play and the actors are good enough. That, I hope, has settled that question.

In conclusion, having told the audience so many nice things about itself, let me indulge in a few salutary "don'ts."

1. Don't ask the box office man if it's a good play.
2. Don't have any faith in dramatic critics, the star system, press agents, photographs in the newspapers, or articles by actors.
3. Don't try to buy tickets for a play an hour before the performance. You will either see a bad show or pay much too much for a good one.
4. Don't attempt to explain the play to your neighbor during the performance. If it is not understood, come again.
5. Don't venture out if you have a bad cough or cold. Stay in bed.
6. Don't, if you know you are well, let the rest of the audience persuade you that you have any bronchial trouble.
7. Don't, when the play is advertised for 8:30, come at 9:45 and then say you couldn't make head or tail of it.
8. Don't, I beg you on bended knees, come in late on first nights, talk loudly after the curtain is up, wear top hats in the aisles, scramble over innocent spectators, bang the seats down, or indulge in any other of the bad manners of the theatre. Unless you happen to be friends of the management — in which case these things will be quite in order.

YANKEES ON ILE ST. LOUIS

One of the Most Picturesque Spots in Paris Has Become a Favorite Residence Place

By BECKLES WILLSON

PARIS.

A MIGHTY outcry has lately arisen in Paris against the Americans who have, it is said, "annexed" the Ile St. Louis, that historic and hitherto obscure island in the Seine which lies just east of Notre Dame. One journal proclaims that the island has fallen into Yankee clutches; that one house in two is now owned by an American. It appears that several wealthy Americans have acquired ancient hotels on the Quai d'Orleans, and that others are meditating the purchase of historic mansions in the interior of the island, but there remains a strong leaven of French who apparently have no intention of moving.

Ile St. Louis, in Princess Marthe Bibesco's phrase, is an anchored "galley in the Seine," half a mile or so long, and very compact, both of masonry and history, with many notable literary and artistic associations; and, moreover, the veritable spot where the young Napoleon Bonaparte first alighted in Paris, from the water-diligence pier, on Oct. 19, 1784.

Yet this St. Louis, as an inhabited isle, with a special character of its own, is not old, scarcely more than three centuries. It is formed of the two barren medieval islets of Notre Dame and Isle aux Vaches, which somehow escaped habitation until the seventeenth century. By an odd coincidence, at the very time Virginia and Massachusetts were receiving their first white settlers building operations were begun here and within a few years the site became covered with splendid dwellings, and, joined into a single island, was given the name of St. Louis.

Centuries before, that pious monarch was wont to resort daily to the Isle Notre Dame, to recite his prayers in sylvan solitude. Occasionally, in the reign of his successors, especially Philip le Bel, open-air ceremonies—jousts, feasts and tournaments—were held here. It was also a place for duels. The very first bridge connecting the island and the city was the work of an engineer, Christopher Marie, in 1614, and this same Marie, in association with a couple of other royal contractors, Le Regrattier and Poulletier, planned and constructed the whole quarter. So swiftly was the transformation brought about that the poet Corneille could exclaim, in verse often quoted:

Paris to my eyes seems a country of romance;
Methought I saw this morn an isle enchanted;
At eve returning, lo! it was thronged with life:
Some new Amphion had waved his magic wand
And changed these groves into palaces superb.

By the end of Louis XIII's reign a model town had arisen, covering every available foot of ground throughout the area, and this became peopled with equal rapidity. A large church (St. Louis en l'Ile) was built, and many noble mansions lined the quays, named Bourbon, Orleans, Bethune and Anjou; other bridges, too, were flung across the Seine. From its earliest days this island took on a character of its own. It was noticeably different from the rest of Paris. Poets, artists and philosophers, as well as statesmen and financiers, flocked there.

Among celebrated literary characters none is more singular than Rétif de la Bretonne, eighteenth century author of the famous "Inscripcions," whose daily habit it was to perambulate the quays and carve dates on the stone walls. These dates—the earliest belonged to 1776—referred to events in Rétif's private life and were generally accompanied by certain Latin words or letters commemorating some passing thought or mood.

These curious inscriptions became affected with time, so Rétif de la Bretonne copied them all into a book with commentaries—a literary production which is still read and prized today.

Voltaire dwelt here when planning his "Henriade," and later came George Sand, Theophile Gautier, Baudelaire and Sainte Beuve.

Among artists there were Mignard, Lebrun, Lesueur, and in the last century Meissonier, while the imposing statue of the great sculptor Barye (to which his American admirers largely contributed) attests his long connection with the island.

But a brief stroll will put us in possession of the salient traits of a quarter which, even yet, the bulk of American visitors miss and which Parisians themselves know little of. A recent poet, Ville-Mirmont, who was killed in the war, begins one of his poems:

And now behold
The Ile of Saint-Louis
Of all the isles the most deserted.

As for the older inhabitants, when they start to cross one of the five bridges, they say, "I am going to Paris."

Leaving, then, Notre Dame and the city by the Pont St. Louis, we gain the end of the Quai de Bourbon at its junction with the Quai d'Orleans. Here is the American quarter par excellence and for a reason which is instantly obvious. The view behind you is the most exquisite and interesting in all Paris. From no point does the great cathedral appear to such advantage; also, you have the view of the Seine, the distant, lofty Pantheon and the Latin quarter and all the leading monuments of the Left Bank. When one adds the enchantment of the early morning light on the Archbishop's Palace, the towers and the flowing, winding river, or the even greater beauty of the sunset behind and beyond Paris it is manifest why dwelling here is a delight.

A few steps further on stands the Hotel Lauzun, perhaps the finest and most interesting private house in all Paris. In 1842 it was bought by Baron Pichon, whose heirs, half a century later, disposed of it to the City of Paris, which proposed to turn it into a museum. But in 1908 it reverted once more to the Pichon family, who have carried out much restoration. It had a bad period during the mid-century when it was let piecemeal to tenants, even though among these same tenants were the painter, Boissard, his friend, Gautier, and the poet, Baudelaire.

It was in the Hotel Le Charron, which has a most fascinating courtyard, that the painter Meissonier had his studio where he was visited, as many recent memoirs testify, by numerous admirers. At a neighboring corner one finds the cabaret Franc-Pinot, which boasts a beautiful old grille and something more—a tragic memory. For the daughter of a former proprietor was Cecile Renault, the girl of 19 who tried to kill Robespierre and, failing, was guillotined.

Ile St. Louis is cut in two equal halves by a narrow street of the same name, on which the church and several other noble mansions are situated. But it is largely given up to petty tradesmen. One of the finest hotels, the Hotel Chenizot, formerly the residence of the Archbishops of Paris, is now used as a common warehouse. The great syndicate of Paris bakers occupies a large building on the Quai d'Anjou as headquarters while, close at hand, a modest printing-press turns out a small literary sheet, Le Semaphore.

RIDDLES OF TIME STILL TO BE ANSWERED

ing soul, except his party, was within many miles. But across the lake there rose ethereal the five slender pinnacles of an immense and gorgeous temple, complete with its moated walls, its sculptured terraces, its libraries and its shrines. It might have been a mirage in the desert or a dream from the Arabian Nights.

It was Angkor, the ancient capital of the kingdom of Cambodia, a metropolis whose inhabitants may have numbered 1,000,000, a city second to none in Asia, a Delhi, a Bagdad, a Peking. No earthquake destroyed this city. No Etna poured lava upon it. Yet the dwellers therein decided, one and all, to dwell elsewhere. So completely was the city forgotten that mention of it was dismissed as a traveler's tale. Yet there stand its palaces and temples, displaying their pristine splendor, a fact stranger by far than any fiction. Why was Angkor handed over to the invading siege of the forest primeval? The sphinx is silent.

The past is thus no mere period. It is a perspective of periods. There is a past behind the past. Even Stonehenge is merely a modern improvement on the original and authentic Stonehenge. So with Damascus and Wall Street.

The frequent and ominous hints in Scripture that mighty kingdoms were left to the owl and the jackals open up a vista of unrecorded yet now demonstrated tragedy. In societies, compared with which Nineveh and Tyre are modern, the organized life of man collapsed again and again under the weight of its own superstructure, leaving scarcely "a wrack" behind.

A Druid Relic.

Photograph from Ewing Galloway.

In the mid-Pacific, 2,000 miles from the Chilean coast, there rises, sheer from midocean a lonely island. It is only thirteen miles long and seven miles broad.

Yet Western sailors as they passed this island noticed that it was full of huge statues. There are 600 of them, often thirty feet high. They are statues of men, from the waist up, with enormous hats and large ears. Also, there are 260 immense stone platforms, with graves included, on many of which those statues once stood erect.

Climb the slopes of Easter Island to its volcanic cone, and we find quarries. Statues are lying about, actually in process of carving. Some are nearly finished; others only begun; and the masons have left their tools behind them—flints held in the hand—just as if they had quit work for the dinner hour.

If ever there was a mystery it is here. On Easter Island there are today only 250 persons, and what would we say of New York if this city had two statues and one cemetery per head of the population? In Pompeii, doubtless, life was interrupted. But we know the reason. There was an eruption of Vesuvius. Over those deserted quarries on Easter Island there was no eruption. There is no evidence that anybody was killed. You could resume work on the statues with the very tools of the earlier workmen. Yet something stopped it all, and when you inquire of the sphinx, she is, if that be possible more silent than ever before.

True, they have picked up a block of wood on the island; wood elaborately inscribed. But it only tantalizes our curiosity. The islanders cannot interpret it, nor can anybody else. Like the hieroglyphics on the Rosetta Stone, it offers a cryptogram to be deciphered, but without a key in parallel columns. That wooden record is no more than the latest jest of the sphinx at our expense.

Over the mystery of Easter Island, archaeology is cautious. It admits the riddle of the sphinx. It hesitates to read the riddle; and no wonder. For the only solution, seriously suggested, staggers the imagination. It would mean, not merely that man has changed his institutions during the ages, but that the very earth itself has changed beneath man's feet. Was Easter Island at one time a mountain, rising above a much larger and more populous territory? That might explain it.

At least, there is tradition to support the conjecture. The Greeks used to talk of an island continent which they called Atlantis, and they declared that, one dreadful day of doom, it was plunged forever into the depths of the ocean that still bears its name. Recent explorers—for instance, William Beebe—have surmised that possibly there was more substance in the story than some of us had supposed; anyway, he scoured those waters in order to make sure.

A similar legend pervades the Pacific. India and Burma are separated from Peru by a distance, let us say, of 10,000 miles. Most of that distance is salt water. Yet on both sides of those high seas, the archives are said to suggest that there was once a country called Mu, the bridge of the Pacific; that the fountains of the great deep were opened up and an entire civilization submerged. It may be mere myth, but even so, when a myth is universal, there is usually something that gave it a start.

GEOLOGY appears to record no cataclysm so stupendous as the suggested disaster to Mu. But the region is still disturbed: Earthquakes in Japan, volcanic explosions in New Zealand, the awful outburst of Krakatoa off Sumatra, and the rapid rise and fall of various coast lines indicate that equilibrium is not yet stable. Within living memory, the map has changed and mountains, islands, peoples have been overwhelmed.

Easter Island is thus the symbol of a still deeper mystery that spreads over land and sea for thousands on thousands of miles. Let us suppose that the Lindberghs were to undertake a flight around the world and that their route was to lie across Egypt, Mesopotamia, Java, the Pacific Islands and the countries of the Caribbean. What would be their general impression?

The peoples would seem to be, not uncivilized like the Africans, but decivilized. The Egyptian, the Mesopotamian, the Melanesian, the Polynesian and the American Mayas differ in many respects. But they are alike in having had a culture and in having left some of it, at any rate, behind. It is as if a friendly comet had struck the Roman Empire and scattered it in fragments. Something that unified the Pacific region seems to be missing.

In this mystery, architecture is included. The Lindberghs would look upon, first, the Pyramids of Egypt. Then they would swoop over the great ziggurat or staged Tower of Babel at Ur of the Chaldees. Next, they would wonder at the terraced temples of Melanesia. Finally, they would be amazed by the huge altar platforms of Yucatan. In detail and in date, these edifices differ, but in design, they display a fundamental unity. Innocent of arch and dome, they depend upon the breadth of their enormous base and the area diminishes with the height. How was it that the ziggurats of the Caribbean reproduce the ziggurats of Chaldea? The sphinx is silent, but the question remains.

Study the carvings and the inscriptions on these edifices, and mystery is added to mystery. The face of the Pharaohs looks at us amid the backwoods of Latin America, so does the Indian elephant. There are alphabets that fortify the correspondence. There grows on the mind a new conception of the ancient world which adds the Pacific Ocean to the Mediterranean of the classics.

What a world it would have been! Caravans and cavalcades passing east and west from what is now Cairo to what has become Bangkok; thence, further east by boats across the Pacific to the fabled realm of Mu, and on, on to America. If that was what really happened, it is no wonder that the sphinx smiles over the narrow limits of our imagination.

The mystery of the past is thus the repeated collapse of society. Of that collapse, war was one cause but not the only one. The vast remains, now under excavation in so many regions, leave an impression on the mind of power, of grandeur, of wealth. But it was a power, a grandeur, a wealth, enjoyed by the few at the expense of the many.

The temples and the tombs are monuments of tyranny. At Ur, we dig and delve and uncover the horror of it—the King in his mausoleum, with his Queen and her Court, slain at his side and buried with him. If that was the cruelty inflicted on the royal, what was the fate of the serf? No wonder that there was a doomsday.

Whether we have seen the last of such doomsdays, who can say? Armenia has been swept of late by a scythe. Let us hope that America may be spared. Still, merely as amicable speculation, we may entertain ourselves by asking the question what precisely the antiquarian of 5,000 years hence, would make of Chicago, if the citizens of that no mean city were, one day, to walk out of it, never to return, and the solitudes of Michigan Boulevard and the lonely Loop were to be overgrown by weeds and grass, then forest, until, once more, the chipmunk and the buffalo and the rattlesnake and the vulture resumed their sway over prehistoric meat packing and elevated opera.

OUTDOOR CELLARS.

THE road between Quebec and Saint Anne de Beaupré in Canada suggests an Old World pastoral landscape, with its well-kept fields and farms and its quaint villages of old French houses.

Along the road, built into the sloping hillsides, are small structures of field stone. Only the doorway and a part of the roof above are visible; the greater part of the building is under the hill. These are the outdoor cellars, as they are called, used in Winter for storing vegetables and in Summer as the family wine cellar.

SCIENCE DIAGNOSES NAPOLEON'S AILMENT

Malta Fever, Contracted During the Exile to Elba, Racked the Emperor at the Battle of Waterloo, Investigation Shows

IN further explanation of Napoleon's defeat at Waterloo comes a report of a pathological re-examination of a fragment of his body, a century after death. "A portion of the viscera of Napoleon I," announced Lord Moynihan at Leeds, England, in a recent address, "is in our museum of the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons. Certain little tumors found on the intestine were believed at the time of Napoleon's death to be cancerous. A re-examination of them by Sir Arthur Keith shows that the tumors are not malignant, but are similar to, perhaps identical with, those found in the case of Malta fever."

Whether it was cancer or Malta fever that helped to overthrow the Man of Destiny does not matter much now, but, the president of the College of Surgeons remarked, "the preservation of specimens illustrated by this survival of viscera is always interesting and sometimes very informing." It is suggestive in this instance—to young historians eager to break into closed chapters—of what might have eventuated if the doctors had then known as much as now about Malta fever, which was not discovered and identified for seventy-two years after Waterloo.

After the disastrous retreat from Moscow, Prussia, Austria, Russia and Britain assailed France, compelled at last the surrender of Paris, restored the Bourbons to the throne of France and assigned the Island of Elba, between Corsica and Italy, as Napoleon's place of captivity. There, it is now evident, Napoleon began to suffer from the germs of his malady. He was there from May, 1814, to March, 1815, while a congress of victors—statesmen, generals, princes, kings, emperors—were assembled at Vienna to remodel the world and dispute over the new arrangements and dispositions.

THEY thought, said Creasy, that Napoleon had passed away forever from the great drama of European politics, and had not yet completed their triumphant festivities and diplomatic toils when Talleyrand rose up among them and announced that the ex-Emperor had escaped.

Napoleon reassumed the throne, abolished the slave trade and, rejoined by the whole army, marched to battle. His order of the day on June 14, had the old spirit: "We believed in the oaths of princes we left on their thrones; now, leagued against us, they aim at the independence and the most sacred rights of France. Let us, then, march to meet them." Physically he was ailing and suffering. His staff observed in compassion: "He is not the man we fought under," and Houssaye wrote that he was "no longer able to endure prolonged labor."

Arriving at Charleroi, Napoleon dismounted, sent for a chair and sat by the side of the road as his troops filed past, cheered him. "He sat there dozing, the cheers of the troops, deadening the drums and bugles, being powerless to rouse him." On the fateful June 18, according to the letters of his aide-de-camp "he made the plan of battle, and at 10 lay down and slept an hour." An hour lost out of the ten remaining to his active glory. Riding being torture, he dismounted on a hillock in the centre of the French position and seated himself before a table spread with maps and plans. "Sometimes he got up and paced, or to survey different points of the field through a telescope. Sometimes he folded his arms on the table and on them rested his head, in pain or slumber."

One o'clock came, without signs of Grouchy, who had been ordered to shatter the Prussians at Wavre and then extend his line leftward to the main French army. An imperative note was sent to Grouchy, twenty miles away; it did not reach him till 6 o'clock. Some idly wonder now what would have happened if telephone, radio and modern medical knowledge of Malta fever had been available. Perhaps destiny had finished with Napoleon anyway, after letting his genius range from the pyramids to the Kremlin. By 8 o'clock, Wellington had stopped horse and boat and finally the Old Guard, and 20,000 Prussians promised to Wellington, but unexpected by Napoleon, arrived and enfiladed the French terrain with artillery.

Napoleon's aide de camp has told what happened afterward: "Night had fallen. I found the Emperor in an infantry square, and from that moment did not leave his side. The day being irretrievably lost, he moved off in the direction of Charleroi road.

"We made our way not at a gallop, but at foot's pace. He was so overcome with the fatigue and exertion of preceding days that several times he was unable to resist the sleepiness which overcame him, and if I had not been there to uphold him he would have fallen from his horse. We arrived next morning at Charleroi, whence we posted (by chaise) in order to get to Laon. He stopped there for the purpose of writing the bulletin in which he gave an account of the fatal day, and after dining set out for Paris."

On his second abdication he thought of going to America. But the coasts were watched and at the French fortified seaport of Rochefort on the Bay of Biscay he surrendered to the captain of the Bellerophon and was transferred to the rock of St. Helena. His sickness grew worse. He became heavy, walked with difficulty "and his digestion troubled him." Within six years he was asleep forever.

OLD EUROPE VIBRATES TO A NEW TEMPO

régime scattered throughout the world to whom both the new Russia and the new world are anathema, they have proved themselves powerless to thwart Soviet Russia's aims; several times they have tried to crush the new Russian régime and each time they have been defeated. Russia today is Soviet Russia, and, unless all signs fail, the Russia of many tomorrows will still be Soviet Russia.

Already those at the head of this Russia have evinced the strongest partiality for ultra-modern methods, especially American, since they, like many Germans, consider America the land holding the secret of future success. Soviet Russia is flirting with the idea of mass production; she is not afraid of "standardization"; she is contemptuous of forms of thought imprisoned in the molds of yesterday. Unless some crash gives her an unforeseen setback the new Russia should be quite capable of coping with the problems of the new world.

Thus it is that the big nations of Europe look to many a traveler flitting in and out of their borders. What of the others? Mussolini's Italy, though regenerated in many ways since the débâcle that followed the end of the war, speaks in a voice so reminiscent of the prewar Wilhelm Hohenzollern that many foreign visitors cannot help wondering whether such strutting and sabre-rattling is compatible with a leading position in a world grounded on the idea of peace and attuned to every form of peaceful development. As for the rest of Europe's nations, most of them long ago gave up thoughts of waging war—some because of defeat, others because of weakness—so they will have no difficulty in adapting themselves to a world at peace, even if it is not based primarily on European ideals.

AJI-NO-MOTO
ESSENCE OF TASTE

A different seasoning from JAPAN brings you the TASTE of MEAT from the heart of wheat

An enticing new seasoning has swept the Orient, captured the fancy of European chefs and won the regard of American culinary artists.

It is called Aji-No-Moto. Although derived from the heart of wheat, it has the taste of prime beef. This it imparts to vegetables, soups, sauces, spaghetti, and salads . . . blending perfectly with other condiments.

With Aji-No-Moto you can give old and loved dishes new and delightful zest that will inspire jaded appetites to second helpings and happier digestion.

So delicate is the flavor of Aji-No-Moto that you'll never tire of it. Try it. If your grocer hasn't it, send only 26c (stamps or coin) for full size package and our recipe booklet.

"MUSHING" INTO THE FROZEN NORTH BY AIR

mer, there are sudden high winds to be fought and in Spring and Autumn there are the Arctic fogs, even though the obstacles are not insuperable.

Adventure, of course, is inescapable. Not long ago two prospectors were trapped by an early Winter. Snow fell heavily and high winds banked it in deep drifts. The relief plane was late. Starvation faced them. Should they walk back to the base, fifty miles away? They decided to risk it. Soon after they had started, probably the next day, the plane arrived and landed on the snow beside the empty tent. Inside the pilot found a note, "Walking back. Grub giving out." In vain the plane circled about trying to locate the two men. Next day the hunt continued and for many a day after, other planes joining in. Eventually a musher and an Eskimo were flown in to track the two unfortunates. One was found frozen to death; the other, discovered farther along, was in an advanced state of exhaustion, with both his feet frozen. They flew him out and down to Fort Churchill, whence he was taken to Toronto to suffer a double amputation. But he still lives, a survivor of a stern adventure.

OFTENTIMES the wind blows at eighty miles an hour, rises and dies with equal suddenness. With sub-zero weather the cold is intensified and cuts with the sharpness of a razor. Eskimos build igloos around the noses of airplanes to protect the engines while the machine is on the ground. To get lost in that kind of weather is one of the hardest experiences that can befall a man.

But even in Summer, to get lost in the Barren Lands is no joke, as Duke Schiller found out. Flying close to the Arctic Circle his plane ran out of gas and a forced landing was made. He and his mechanic started to "walk out." For twelve weary days they plodded along, lighting the dry moss along the way to attract attention. Then a plane came along and rescued them, the pilot having seen the smoke of a smudge. Yet a search had been going on for nearly two weeks and the smoke from the smudges had not been discovered until the final rescue. Nothing illustrates the immensity of the region so well.

Sometimes, too, there is a touch of humor to these experiences. E. M. Flynn, a mining engineer, and his pilot were once forced down near the Fort Churchill railroad, then in its early days of construction. They had to get a new engine. While they were waiting for it they became good friends with several of the train crews. When, finally, the new engine arrived and the plane had been tested a passenger train came to a halt. First the conductor asked for a ride, then the engineer had to be taken up, and, of course, his assistant wanted one, too. The obliging pilot took them all up, and by the time the joy-riding was over the train, with some 250 clamoring passengers aboard, had been delayed two hours.

It is an axiom in aeronautical circles that an air service is made practical and reliable by the efficiency of its ground organization. Efficient ground organization for Arctic flying is even more a matter of life and death. Every detail has to be worked out beforehand, and planes fly not only on schedule, but report back to their base during the flights by radio, giving their location.

But first of all there must be bases. Gas, food and equipment are sent up north by ship through the Hudson Bay to the northern coast of Canada. Usually the Hudson's Bay Company posts or the Royal Northwest Mounted Police posts become the bases for these flying operations. Hangars are set up, planes are either unloaded and rigged there or are flown up later on. Spare engines and spare parts for the planes, together with landing gears for Summer and Winter, are all stored away in storehouses. Gasoline and oil are put in large caches, and gradually an airport springs into being, with huts, radio mast, machine shops and the rest of the equipment.

If a mining company decides that its operations are going too far inland, another base, or perhaps a sub-base is established inland, perhaps a hundred or so miles. Some of the supplies are taken out by canoe, but most of them are taken out in Winter by dogs, for sledge travel is cheaper, and some of it is flown out at the last minute. When the various bases have been established the airplane is ready for its real work of transporting prospectors.

The prospectors are carried out in pairs. They may be flown several hundred miles away from the base and then landed on a convenient lake and taxied to shore. There they are left with a pup tent, an eiderdown sleeping bag (for the nights are often chilly), a three-sectional collapsible canoe, fishing tackle, rifle and ammunition, a signaling outfit and a certain amount of food. The pair then set off for their first camping ground and the pilot flies back to the base, to start out on another day with two more prospectors.

Left alone, the two men begin prospecting. If they make a find they lay out signals of white fabric and the plane, returning within the month, perhaps in ten days, lands near by and takes aboard a specimen of the ore to be assayed back at the base. If the country they are in proves to be of little promise, they lay out their signals in a different way, and the plane lands to take them off to another locale or back to the base until they are assigned to another job. As a rule they are left out all Summer, and it is up to the mining company to see that they are taken back before the rigors of Winter set in.

Formerly it was not usual for a prospector to prospect further away than about fifty miles from a railway, on account of the difficulty of getting a prospective buyer out to inspect the property. Now they are going hundreds and in come cases more than a thousand miles away from a railway. Now, moreover, even the study of the land goes on much faster with the aid of planes. The geologist, perhaps the most important man in the party, has at all times a plane at his disposal to transport him from lake to lake as he traces the boundaries of various rock formations and follows favorable indications. Some outstanding ore deposits are visible from the air, experience has taught, and several have been staked by geologist and pilot without the need of sending out prospectors.

BUT it is not alone to the trapper and the prospector that the airplane is opening up the North. Every mine found means the establishment of a small mining settlement. Hundreds of men go north and the frontiers of civilization are pushed forward. The white man comes in contact more and more with the Eskimos, and the Eskimos who may rarely see a white man other than a post official, a mounted policeman or the padre, and then often only in Summer, are now beginning to see them at all seasons and in ever-increasing numbers.

What this will ultimately mean to the North is impossible to conjecture. Great tracts of it are certainly fit for human habitation and some for cultivation. Sportsmen are already making it a Mecca for big and small game, and the plane in all cases is providing an easy and relatively inexpensive means of transportation. But whatever this conquest of the airplane may come to mean, whatever its potentialities and portents, we are assured that nature cannot any longer hide her treasures from the prying eyes of men and that in carrying men and mail, food and equipment to the outposts of civilization, and returning from them with the spoils, the destiny of the frozen North is being mightly served by the airplane.

THE CRICKETS THAT SING TO US

MORE superstitions are current about crickets than about almost any other household or field insect. Among them are that crickets bring good luck, bad luck, die in the Fall, and in the late Fall announce by their chirping the coming of snow.

There are many types of crickets, but the most common are the black cricket and the mole cricket, usually found out-of-doors, and the grayish yellow house cricket. The cricket forces himself upon the attention of any one within hearing distance of his "song"—a strident, resonant note sounded at intervals at nightfall. By nature he is a nocturnal songster, no matter whether he is of the species that prefers to live out-of-doors, or of the indoor kind.

The black cricket, found outdoors during the Summer and early Autumn, ventures inside when early Winter appears. This insect often eats holes through garments carelessly left in hay fields and burrows into shocks of grain. It is larger than the so-called house cricket and lives in the ground as long as the weather is mild. Its home is usually a hole from six to twelve inches below the ground. Its eggs are placed on the ground and when hatched the larvae form burrows into the ground to pass the Winter.

The mole cricket, seldom seen by human beings, is particularly fitted for its underground life by a velvety covering to protect it against moisture. Its habits are much like those of the animal from which it takes its name. Its front legs are fitted with teeth for burrowing. It attacks the roots of crops or tubers of potatoes for sustenance, but not often enough to be a real menace to the farmer.

The house cricket is fond of warmth. As a consequence, it likes to live in bakeries, where its burrows are often sunk within a few feet of the oven. In Summer it frequently is seen outdoors, basking in the sun near garden walls or flowers. With the first approach of cold it usually returns indoors, where, if the fire is put out, it becomes dormant.

Like other insects of its species, it is nocturnal in habit, foraging after dark in the kitchen, where crumbs supply it with what it needs. It likes beer and sweetened vinegar. When placed inside a jar indoors with a few breadcrumbs it becomes tame and will sing without fear.

THREE VENERABLE JUSTICES

There are no paradoxes about Justice Brandeis, unless one lies in the fact that so vivid and colorful a defender of human liberty should also be an expert on as dry a subject as interstate commerce. Born in Kentucky, he practiced law in Boston for thirty-five years. President Wilson appointed him to the Supreme Court in January, 1916, and wrote at the time that "he is a friend of all men and a lover of the right; and he knows more than how to talk about the right—he knows how to set it forward in the face of its enemies." But there were those who regarded the Boston attorney as a dangerous firebrand, and who trembled at the thought of such an agitator on the Supreme bench. He had always been the centre of contest, always the champion of the under dog. He argued the case for labor laws that were unpopular with employers and won. He wrote and spoke for Zionism. He was chairman of the board that arbitrated the excitable woes of the garment industry. Dynamic and forceful, he had a burning passion for justice. He was the hero of striking workers and of academic students of social reform. There were those who, while admitting his great ability, murmured that his influence was so disturbing to the established order that President Wilson wanted to put him on the bench in order to silence him. Six months went by before the Senate confirmed his nomination.

WASHINGTON calls him very democratic, and speaks of the friendliness of his wife and the charm of his daughters. There is much music in their house. There is good talk and laughter, burning argument, and an affection for youth that youth repays with the most enthusiastic devotion.

Justice Van Devanter was born in Indiana and did not go to Wyoming until his marriage, but, once arrived, he became an adopted son of the new country with an enthusiasm which has never waned. He and his bride went out there when Wyoming was frontier country. Cheyenne was only a group of shacks. There was very little of law and order, but a great deal of open and violent dispute. Cowboys in high-heeled boots lounged out of saloon doors to the wiry little ponies tied to wooden rails. There was open gambling in the towns and cattle rustling in the country. Settlers coming in met the open hostility of men who resented any fence, any homestead, any interference with their right to send great herds of cattle ranging across the open plains. There were Indian troubles and disputes over public lands, and as the country developed there were complex irrigation problems.

It was a question of law against lawlessness, order against outright criminality. A State was in the making, and young Van Devanter took an enthusiastic part in its molding. He became city attorney for growing Cheyenne. President Harrison appointed him Chief Justice of the Territorial Supreme Court, and he stayed in that position by popular election after Wyoming was admitted to statehood. As United States Attorney General he put his Western experience at the disposal of the Interior Department, which needed a man thoroughly familiar with Indians, wild lands and irrigation law.

PRESIDENT TAFT appointed him to the Supreme Court in 1910, and now as the second oldest justice in point of service he sits at the left hand of Chief Justice Taft.

If facial expression is any index he is a man who dearly loves a contest. In brushes with lawyers who evade the point or are uncertain about references, his eyes sparkle and his jaw sets with a tenacity that looks positively joyous. But in personal conversation he has a delightful old-fashioned courtesy. He is patient in explanation as long as he knows that another mind is trying to follow his.

Washington knows him as a man of extraordinary industry. In a great study lined with calf-bound legal volumes he works early and late over bundles of briefs, each one bound with a wide pink string which is the literal and actual "red tape." To him there is nothing unusual in a press of cases that makes it necessary to work all night.

In every age and many lands there have been men who found age no hindrance to their chosen occupation. Benjamin Franklin, who, after he was 65, performed the most important duties of his life and secured the future of the young Republic; John Quincy Adams who, as Senator from Massachusetts and a man in his sixties, swam across the Potomac every morning, are two of America's favorite examples. Always they have been the heroes of the people, who saw in them a proof that the hard old rules did not always hold, that years were not always the victors, and that time's scythe did not always prevail on schedule. Somehow they seemed to have escaped the dread decrees that shut down remorselessly about other men. Somehow they were a proof that man could rise above his fate.

There is something of this quality in the three senior Justices of the Supreme Court. They continue to work because they wish to work. They have in their hands power that goes to the shaping of the nation's future. They are at the head of one of the three branches of government established by the Constitution. Appointed for life, they are more fortunate than the executive and the legislative heads, for they need not face the turmoil of election nor be involved in the hurly-burly of politics. Holding the highest judicial positions in the land, they are beyond the fever of ambition or the pressure of influence.

Justice Holmes issued a public statement at one time that he saw no reason for retiring while his mental and physical powers permitted him to continue on the bench, and that disposed of rumors said to have been set on foot by certain interests which had hoped to substitute a man more malleable to their arguments. If you are rude enough to ask the other two about retiring you will be answered by one of those gentle but quite firmly reprimanding smiles which Supreme Court Justices use with such devastating effect. The subject of retirement is not discussed.

If you have
to invest!

CONSIDER the remarkable profit possibilities offered you by large income-producing buildings under THE FRENCH PLAN.

Your investment of any convenient sum—$100 to $100,000—under THE FRENCH PLAN is safeguarded—by actual value in well-located, improved New York real estate!

You receive the entire net profit distributed from the operation of the property until every dollar of your original capital has been repaid to you—plus 6%.

Thereafter, you continue to share in ownership and profits and receive 50% of all profits distributed from the operation of the property, despite the fact that your original investment has been repaid to you in full, plus cumulative 6%!

THE FRENCH PLAN gives you a sound investment in VALUE—plus 6%—plus the repayment of your original investment—plus 50% of all profits distributed thereafter.

Can any investment be safer than well-selected New York real estate? Does any other investment give you a more generous share of earnings than all profits until every dollar of your investment has been repaid to you plus interest? What other investment continues to pay you profits after your capital has been repaid to you?

Your Copy is Ready!

Thousands of discriminating New Yorkers have invested millions of dollars in large income-producing buildings under this Plan and are now sharing generously in profits from operation—and from the increase in land values.

You will find complete details in the 74-page book "THE FRENCH PLAN"—and you will doubtless find it the most interesting and profitable reading you have done in months!

The Gift Wonderful for Your Child This Christmas

The BOOK OF KNOWLEDGE

The Children's Encyclopedia

The great departments of The Book of Knowledge tell the child or youth what is most worth knowing and they are fascinatingly illustrated by nearly everything worth seeing. The child has the World Wonderful spread before him in story and picture and in delightful articles written with all the charm of intimate conversation. The Book of Knowledge forms a marvelously handy little library of nature, science, history, biography, art, literature and manual activities. It is a delightful source of reading, entertainment and ready reference during the entire period of school life. It furnishes a complete selection of necessary and important information for the children of the world of today, and it has become the most important help in getting an education worth having.

Facts Hard to Believe

The Book of Knowledge is in the hands of nearly three million children today and has been printed in six different languages. It is never off the press. Parents demand it for the home, teachers for the school, and best of all the children love it as a great friend and helper in all the major activities of their daily lives.

It stands at the top of the children's Christmas list, year after year. There is nothing half so useful or attractive to growing minds. It has more pages, more pictures, more subjects, more value for less money than any other educational work for the young.

Pictures That Talk

Pictures are the most effective means of conveying quickly a fact, an idea, a process, a story. "One picture is worth 10,000 words," and The Book of Knowledge shows 15,000 striking educational and descriptive pictures. It takes the children on unforgettable visits to mighty industrial workshops; shows them all the animals, birds, fishes, trees and flowers; explains about the working of their bodies and their minds, about citizenship and economics, about foreign lands and people, about our own land, its history, government, industries and ideals. The treasures of art and literature are spread before their eyes. Think what that means to the child in the home!

Makes Children Enjoy Reading

The arrangement of The Book of Knowledge is one of its most successful features. It is based on the natural working of the mind of a child—from the Known to the Unknown—from the simple to the more complex—and never too much or too heavy mental food at one time. The articles are all of exactly the right length to hold and not weary the attention. At the head of each is a brief summary of what it is about, and at the end a continuation line which turns to the next article on the same subject. In case the child has wearied, there, in the very next article, is a change of subject and fresh pictures to rest the mind and beguile the young reader into keeping on. Every teacher knows the marked difference between the child who reads for information and the one who does not. That difference continues all through life. The Book of Knowledge makes reading children, observant children, children who succeed easily in what they attempt.

Send Them to The Book of Knowledge for Information, Occupation and Delight

Can you answer clearly when they ask you such simple things as:

Why does water freeze?
Why do our teeth chatter?
Why do we dream?
Why is it dark at night?
What makes a match strike?
What makes silver turn black?
What makes the speedometer work?
What makes the bees hum?
Why does a nettle sting?
Why are distant hills blue?

If you cannot explain such simple things, you need The Book of Knowledge, and your children need it still more. Mail the coupon for the Free Booklet, now, and give your child a day of delight. With the Booklet, you will receive, also free, a colorful 8-page reprint of quaint old Christmas carols which you can sing.

SEND THE COUPON — Accept 3-Day Test—It May End for You the Restless Nights That Wreck Nerves and Health

You Fall Asleep

Almost As Soon As You Go To Bed—This New Way

Please Accept 3-Day Test—Note Coupon

Now an Utterly DRUGLESS Way to Sound Sleep—Boundless Energy the Next Day

YOU fall asleep almost as soon as you go to bed. And all the next day teem with new energy and "pep". You look and feel like a different person.

On doctors' advice, millions employ this new way. For it is as free of drugs as the bread you eat or the milk you drink. And does far more than simply induce sleep! It rebuilds your wasted tissues while you sleep.

What It Is

It is called Ovaltine; a scientific food-concentrate developed in Switzerland by a scientist of world-fame. You take it in a cup of warm milk at bedtime; a super-delicious drink.

First, it induces sleep; sound, natural sleep. The kind that rebuilds and rejuvenates.

Then, while you sleep, Ovaltine resupplies your system with the energy lost the previous active day. For it contains practically every building element necessary to life and energy, in a form which the human system can easily absorb while you sleep.

You can take it night after night and not only not form a habit, as with drugs, but build up your health as well.

Do you wonder then, that people are flocking to its use? New to America, Ovaltine is being recommended by over 20,000 doctors. Used for 30 years in Europe, its use has spread over 54 different nations. It marks one of the most important scientific findings of its time.

Accept Test

Doctors urge it not only for sleeplessness, but for all nervous and run-down conditions. They recommend it, too, for nervous, underweight children. Thousands of busy people take it during the day to relieve fatigue and restore vitality. A few weeks' use will make an amazing difference in the way you feel.

Believe or not what people claim for Ovaltine. Try it. Obtain at any drug or grocery store, or use coupon for special 3-day test.

BLANKETS — modern as morning

They make the most perfect Christmas gifts!

Fresh as a new day—the exquisite monotones and duotones of North Star Blankets add adorable accent to bedrooms done in the manner moderne. By day, they provide charming color as they lie over the foot of the bed—by night, their cozy lightness suggests the proverbial feather. Take the downy, cloudlike depth of a North Star pure wool Blanket between your fingers. Feel how it gives, gently—caressingly. Watch it spring back as you release the pressure. Think what this means in warmth and comfort! Every bedroom in your house—whether its décor be modern or mediaeval, early American or late Empire—deserves its complement of North Star Blankets. Their colors—crocus yellow, rose pink, bluet, orchid, and fern-frond green—like garden flowers, fit perfectly into any decorative scheme. Every good store has—or can order—North Star Blankets in colors to please you. Just write: North Star Woolen Mill Company, Minneapolis, Minn.

le Début Gifts

How quickly the Lady of Fashion recognizes the compliment expressed in a gift of le Début! "Why! this was distilled especially for me," she whispers, as she breathes the delicate fragrance of the French made Parfum. "It is my mood—the very essence of my personality—that is imprisoned in this charming flacon."

"And, surely, no mere chance could have designed this Compacte, so thoughtfully attentive to every whim of my ensemble!"

Gifts of le Début are essentially of Today's mode . . . recognizing in their every detail the importance of individuality. There's a Parfum created in Paris . . . in four distinct odeurs . . . symbolic of the four loveliest feminine moods. A Compacte of genuine cloisonné . . . to be chosen in four colors to harmonize with every costume. And a Lip Stick . . . a happy mate for the Compacte . . . in the most modern shades.

(a) CHATELAINE LE DEBUT—a graceful chain [illegible] and Lip Stick le Début . . . in four colors—blue, green, ivory or black. And . . . both compacte and lip stick are refillable. Price $10.00. Lip Stick alone, $2.50. Compacte with chain $7.50.

(b)

(b) COMPACTE LE DEBUT — Snap back the octagonal cloisonné top (blue, green, black or ivory, as you wish) . . . there's your powder (loose or compact) and rouge, in your own skin tone. And it's refillable. Price $5.00.

(c)

(c) PARFUM LE DEBUT — the essence of four lovely moods in four distinctive odeurs . . . created, sealed and packaged in Paris in flacons of symbolic color. Prices $3.75, $7.50, $12.50.

"Why, Marge . . How Lovely!"

INSTANTLY your guests note the beauty of your "BTC Hostess" set—ready for the game. Its pleasing color, artistry of pattern and graceful lines appeal to everybody. Guests are delighted, too, by its harmony with your other furnishings.

In homes where bridge is a part of the social life, a "BTC Hostess" set is as essential as a davenport—a most appropriate Christmas gift. The comfort of the amply-proportioned, generously-padded chairs makes your guests feel "at home." And the ease with which table and chairs can be set up and moved about allows convenient arrangement without upsetting the other furnishings.

The party over, your "BTC Hostess" set is folded away in the closet—4 chairs stacking in but 6½ inches. Its steadiness and pressed-steel strength—combined with its easy cleanability—guarantee years of service.

MILTON C. WORK, world-famous authority on bridge, says:

"Without physical comfort the mental concentration needed for bridge is impossible. Thoughtful hostesses realize that a steady table and comfortable chairs are essentials. The "BTC Hostess" sets meet the demands of the most exacting."

WHAT WESTINGHOUSE IS DOING TO MODERNIZE THE HOME

Westinghouse automatic devices make Westinghouse electric ranges, irons, percolators, waffle irons more useful and dependable.

Westinghouse motors, designed and built for long and carefree service, constitute the heart of many modern electrical appliances

This new freedom—electricity's gift to women

Imagine a home with servants at every hand—eager servants to do all the tedious tasks, willing servants to keep everything spick and span—to bring you new hours of freedom and happiness throughout the year.

Such luxury need not be left to the land of dreams. You can have it for yourself just as thousands of others have it . . . by letting electricity be your servant. Electrical appliances can now perform practically every chore in the house—and their cost is within reach of even modest incomes.

Every woman remembers how much the vacuum cleaner meant toward lightening her daily work. Millions now wash and iron with electricity. Hundreds of thousands already delegate their daily cooking and baking to automatic electric ranges.

Other thousands are discovering daily how convenient it is to let electricity wash the dishes, scrub and wax the floors, do the sewing, whip up dainty desserts, even wind the clock. These and dozens of other tasks electricity performs at a trifling cost. For Westinghouse, and the manufacturers who use Westinghouse motors and other electrical equipment, have given electricity efficient hands with which to do your work.

In every field of human activity Westinghouse has pioneered with electricity, taking loads from tired backs, responsibility from tired minds. Every article made by Westinghouse is fitted to its task. The appliances that Westinghouse supplies for homes are just as carefully constructed as the great turbines, generators and locomotives which it builds to carry the responsibilities of industry.

In the modern idiom is this Aranium Electric Coffee Service, Radner Pattern, K4580/9, $62. Nine-cup urn alone, $30. Sugar and Creamer, $19.50. Tray, $12.50.

Aranium Candlesticks, K638. . . . These will still be bright, still beautiful, after they have held up a thousand little candles and twinkled softly under their thousand little flames. 3½ inches tall. Bases carved of Catalin, in jade, agate or onyx. $9 a pair. Twice as tall (7¼ inches) and with slender jewel-like stems, $7.50 a pair.

FROM the untying of ribbons and the crackle of tissue on Christmas morning—these Aranium gifts will be lifted to receive full applause. They have the cool glimmers of frost itself, and will twinkle beyond measure at every near light.

But the applause that really counts will come through all the days that follow — through coffee-and-toast breakfasts, candle-lighted dinners, coffee-and-sandwich galas in drawing-rooms of afternoons—when these Aranium appointments will still be freshly gleaming.

Aranium does not tarnish. Its gift is an occasion for maids to rejoice, for their mistresses will never ask them to polish these appointments. And for hostesses to rejoice—Aranium stays its glistening best.

You can take care, adequately, of this name and that name on your Christmas list as you stand before an assortment of these Aranium gifts in some nearby electric shop, house-furnishing or department store. But if the gifts shown here are already sold when you make your selection, send us check or money order, and we will ship the pieces you want to the addresses you name. Please inform us if you wish Christmas cards enclosed. Manning, Bowman & Company, Meriden, Connecticut.

THERE'S a restaurant I visit occasionally, on 36th Street, that has an old-world charm. As quiet and slow-moving as a London chop house. No one ever eats there who is in a hurry. The waiters are never ruffled.

The food is superb. Mutton chops broiled as only English cooks can broil mutton. Kidneys and bacon—a famous breakfast dish, deep dish fruit pies, meat pies in melting crusts. But there's one American down-South dish always listed—fried chicken. They tell me they just couldn't keep it off the menu, for after all, New York is in America.

What happened to our fried chicken

So they did something with our typical American dish—something typically English. They finished the frying with a long simmering or even a baking. And I will say that their method has its virtues. For cooked in this fashion an old roasting chicken becomes as succulent and tender as the youngest fry.

I knew you'd be interested in a recipe that does that to a chicken. You must use Crisco, though, for it's only with Crisco, the sweetest flavored fat I've ever tasted that you get the best results.

When you think about it isn't it strange any woman is willing to fry food in a fat she wouldn't be willing to taste all by itself? When I think that way about frying I simply can't imagine using anything but Crisco. For Crisco, just as it comes from its new air-tight can, tastes for all the world like freshly churned butter.

Another thing about Crisco aside from its flavor, is the fact that it never smokes in frying pan or frying kettle if maintained at proper frying temperature.

And by the way, you can make cakes quicker, too, with Crisco—it's so workable that you put your Crisco, sugar and eggs into the mixing bowl together and blend them with one operation. You save from ⅓ to ½ your mixing time that way!

WINIFRED S. CARTER

SMOTHERED CHICKEN

1 roasting chicken — flour — salt and pepper
3 tablespoons Crisco — ½ pint (or more) milk

Clean and cut chicken at joints as for frying. Dredge in salt, pepper and flour. Melt Crisco in heavy frying pan and when hot, add chicken. Cook slowly, browning on both sides until crust is formed. Add more Crisco, if necessary, from time to time. Pour excess Crisco back into can through cheesecloth. (It will not carry the flavor of the food cooked in it. Crisco can be used over and over again for frying.) Then pour sufficient milk over chicken to cover it. Cover with lid and cook slowly over fire until tender or place skillet in moderate oven (350° F.) and cook until done. You may have to add milk, or water, during this time. Serve chicken in this gravy.

ALL MEASUREMENTS LEVEL—Recipes tested and approved by Good Housekeeping Institute. Crisco is the registered trade-mark of a shortening manufactured by the Procter and Gamble Co.

In its new air-tight can—as fresh and sweet as the day it was made

You taste milk. You test eggs. Now, taste Crisco—then any other shortening. Then you'll understand why Crisco's own sweet, fresh flavor so improves the flavor of your CAKES PIES BISCUITS COOKIES FRIED FOODS

GIFTS THAT HAVE A WAY WITH WOMEN

A PROSPECTIVE but puzzled Santa Claus need take only one look in this establishment to find what women really want for Christmas. • For here he will see so many wives and daughters, mothers and fiancées lingering spellbound at our resplendent cases. Each is imagining this lovely brooch caught at the girdle of her favorite dancing frock or that stunning necklace outlined against the saffron of a velvet dinner gown . . . to be that subtle accent, the individual note, which means much to the woman who dresses well. • And there is, too, about these ornaments an indefinable chic which is the assurance of the informed woman that Marcus & Company designers keep alert eyes upon the creations of Parisian couturiers . . . a fact which gives these jewels a very real authority in the world of fashion. • Among the gifts that would delight the heart of any woman you will find strings of pearls from $100,000 to $140. Loose pearls to add to necklaces are priced from $25,000 to $5. Emeralds in many shapes and sizes from $35,000 to $300. Star sapphires and star rubies in bracelets, rings and necklaces, from $28,000 to $25.

A striking platinum and diamond dinner ring set with oblong corner-cut spinel ruby. The price is $2500. B An unusually lovely diamond and platinum wrist-watch. The flexible bracelet is formed of two rows of diamonds. The price is $2850. C A lovely platinum bracelet paved with diamonds and set with three square corner-cut emeralds. The price is $4750. D A superb pear-shaped black pearl mounted on a scarf pin. The price is $3975. E A stunning diamond and pearl necklace. The centerpiece is set with a blue star sapphire, surrounded by diamonds. The price is $5850. F An exquisite flower brooch of diamonds and emeralds accented with black enamel lines. The price is $2600. G In deference to the masculine heart . . . a handsome paneled English platinum seal ring set with a large seal sapphire. The price is $3650.

The [illegible] who LOVED [illegible] AND [illegible]

PERHAPS unjustly, popular opinion has it that royal couples of bygone centuries were consistently inconstant—but history has no page of domestic simplicity and happiness to exceed that of Queen Marie Amelie and her husband, King Louis Philippe of France.

Midst trying political intrigue, they with their four children, retained a degree of marital bliss which was, and is, an inspiration to the generations that followed.

The Queen who loved her husband was a woman of great personal charm. She was ever attentive to the details of her person. Her perfumes were made expressly for her by the Parisian, M. Francois Lubin, and she thought so highly of his artistry in distilling rare flower-odeurs, that she acknowledged him publicly as her appointed Parfumeur.

The same Parfum Lubin which accentuated the charm of Queen Marie Amelie, is the delight of those women who recognize that the mystic, elusive quality of especially distilled odeurs most truly expresses their individual charm.

L'OCEAN BLEU . . . is one of the most entrancing of the exotic Parfums Lubin. It whispers the romance of balmy breezes, and lazy suns on broad blue oceans — and breathless moments under shady palms. This delightful odeur may be secured at the finest shops.

*Patent of Parfumeur
To the Court of Queen Marie Amelie of France
To-day the eleventh April of the year eighteen hundred and thirty-four, Her Majesty MARIE AMELIE, Queen of the French, being at the Palace of the Tuileries, has granted and grants to M. LUBIN P. F., Paris, the Patent of Parfumeur of his Royal Highness M. the Duke of Aumale, and of His Royal Highness M. the Duke of Montpensier, authorizing him to take the title and to place it in front of his house. As a testimonial of her will, the Queen has ordered the drawing of the present Patent which she has signed of her own hand and which she had counter-signed by myself, secretary of the Commandments of Her Majesty.

The purest ingredients and high-quality Jamaica ginger are used

No accident attends the distinction which is "Canada Dry." No accident has won it the approving nod of connoisseurs the wide-world over. For "Canada Dry," first, has basic excellence.

This basic excellence begins with absolutely pure ingredients. "Canada Dry" contains high-quality Jamaica ginger. It is blended and balanced in exact proportions. Hourly check-ups are made to see to it that those proportions do not vary. A secret and exact process of carbonation contributes, finally, to that result—the crystal clear, sparkling beverage you pour from an emerald bottle. "Canada Dry" Ginger Ale.

At luncheon today, capture that thrill, that new delight, which "Canada Dry" brings to the meal. Try it.

THE VITAL QUESTION

In the Preface to a Book of "Theatres" Joseph Urban Considers the American Drama

By J. BROOKS ATKINSON.

America, like Athens at her great period, has material means in abundance. America, moreover, is free from the influence of the now dying royal conservatism and bureaucracy which, in Europe, still crushes the vitality of the living with the weight of history and tradition. American life belongs to the future! America has the means and the opportunity; has she a spiritual endowment comparable with that of the Greeks, two and a half millenniums ago? The age has yet to give proof of this. It lies with America to allow a great promise to perish or to mature.—Joseph Urban, in "Theatres."

THUS, in the final paragraph of his brief preface to a book of theatre designs, Joseph Urban asks the one vital question underlying every aspect of American life. Although endowed with the means and the opportunity, has America a spiritual endowment sufficient to the occasion? Only the pests disturb the quiet of the counting-room with this nebulous and elusive inquiry. Something of the sort Eugene O'Neill had in mind last Spring in his manifesto for "Dynamo": "It seems to me that any one trying to do big work nowadays must have this big subject behind all the little subjects of his plays or novels, or he is simply scribbling around on the surface of things." The American vocabulary is buoyantly idealistic. Hardly a theatre opens its doors or hardly a group sits down in conference to revitalize the decaying drama without a blazing sweep of the heavens and the hiss of highly compressed idealistic steam. But as Mr. Urban is shrewd enough to suggest, the age has yet to prove that the contagious melody of idealism is more than lip-service to the deity of rhetoric, or that the spirit is strong enough to discover the great themes and sustain them. Whether or not something enduringly fine grows out of all that we have accumulated, is the major question.

IT is not unusual to find so lucid an analysis of assets and liabilities in the book of a scene designer and architect, for by the nature of their craft they are less immersed in the theatre than the playwrights and actors. They can and do practice their profession outside; frequently they have an intellectual perspective broader than that of their theatrical colleagues. And since they are the ones who have recently been making the most conspicuous progress in the theatre they must often feel that they are ready for richer dramatic art than comes their way. For instance, you cannot look into this volume of theatre plans, which has been beautifully published by Theatre Arts, Inc., without realizing that Mr. Urban's architectural conceptions are generally more Promethean than the arts they are designed to shelter. The exception is the Ziegfeld Theatre. Having long been associated with Mr. Ziegfeld, Mr. Urban knew exactly how to house those stately extravaganzas, and since this festive playhouse was built in 1926, "Rio Rita" and "Show Boat" have amply fulfilled the promise of the fantastic mural and the inviting stage.

BUT some of the other plans and projects raise the question whether we have any body of art consistently great enough to put in them. Consider the solid masses of the first of the Metropolitan Opera House studies, and the variegated forms developed for the Fifty-seventh Street project in an attempt, as Mr. Urban points out, "to find an architectural form so free that it can in turn set free every modern impulse which would tend to heighten and develop the form of grand opera, to make it not grandiose but grand, as large in spirit as it is in scale." Consider chiefly the stupendous project for the Music Centre—modern in proportions and beautifully classic in its details of main stage and auditorium, and its subordinate Greek theatre, which may be used for concerts, dancing, revivals of classic dramas, or merely as a foyer. If only life were on the scale of these great art shrines! While looking at them it is easy to imagine a golden age in which drama and music and audiences would move in the rhythm of Mr. Urban's colossal imagination and regard his plans not as inspiring symbols but as suitable framework for the home of the living art of the day. At present all the spiritual idealism left in the theatre seems perfectly at home in the dreary old playhouse where Miss Le Gallienne's repertory company acts before capacity audiences more than 90 per cent of the time. Meanwhile, like the grand Century Theatre, such designs as Mr. Urban's genius dips out of the Pierian Spring merely remind us that we have no art transcendental enough to suit them.

IF the theatre were merely the art of the scene designers, we should be very well off. Perhaps their job is the easiest to toss off—definite in its expression and finished for good when the performance is ready. At any rate, scene designers are constantly at work upon the decoration of dramatic productions that use only the surface of their abilities. Robert Edmond Jones, whose writings on the theatre have remarkable perception, works with equal integrity upon such tensile dramas as "The Commodore Marries," "The Channel Road" and "Cross Roads," and upon such fripperies as "Week End" and "See Naples and Die." Norman-Bel Geddes, the most visionary of the designers, returns to the theatre after nearly two years with the designs for a racy musical comedy, "Fifty Million Frenchmen." Jo Mielziner, who designed that deep first-act illusion for "Karl and Anna," is represented in the same season by the settings for such balderdash as "Jenny," "First Mortgage" and "The Amorous Antic." Lee Simonson, whose designs for "Liliom" and "Marco Millions" made history, finds release for his many energies in designing furniture and in writing illuminating art criticism. Aline Bernstein is an artist and a person who constantly contributes more gayety to the "Grand Street Follies" than the authors or the actors.

BUT, like the "real pump," around which the bombastic Dickens character proposed to build a play, the decoration of dramas is more interesting than essential. When you see the Ben Greet company playing "Much Ado About Nothing," with only a few curtains and props, or William Gillette acting before daubs on canvas, you realize how trivial is everything in the theatre save dramatists and actors. The scene designers are the first to confess it. And Mr. Urban believes in the drama above everything else. It is more moving than life, he says in his preface—gayer, fuller, more exalted. He reminds us that, like religion, it is a record of man's effort to transcend everyday experience. On the platform of the unostentatious theatre where Shakespeare played, Mr. Urban says with a vigor that is as good as authority, "the art of acting was brought to a state of perfection which never from the time of classic drama to our own day has been excelled." Certainly, they had the plays; Mr. Urban believes that they had the actors also.

AND what have we in this restless era? Mr. Urban believes that for the first time since the "snow-white building on the Acropolis" we are in a position to understand the significance of the classic drama and apply it to our times. With their research into the concrete evidence of Greek stages and seating plans, the architects have done more than any one else to remind us that decoration is nothing, that technical equipment is nothing, that magnificence of building is nothing, but that everything rests with the dramatist and the actor—and, in the last analysis, with the dramatist alone. Our dramatists and our theatres generally lack that spiritual endowment of which Mr. Urban writes above; the theatre is a racket. Of all our dramatists Mr. O'Neill alone attacks the great themes. Whatever his shortcomings may be as an artist or thinker, he is not content to prattle the old banalities of infidelity, and unlike most of his contemporaries, he is stifled in a two-dimensional world. In fact, into the mouth of the Great Kaan in "Marco Millions" he put the case against exterior materialism very bluntly: "Marco's spiritual hump begins to disgust me. He has not even a mortal soul, he has only an acquisitive instinct. We have given him every opportunity to learn. He has memorized everything and learned nothing. He has looked at everything and seen nothing. He has lusted for everything and loved nothing. He is only a shrewd and crafty greed." It is still the major question whether material abundance acquired largely in that spirit can flower overnight into an art transcending everyday experience. Mr. Urban says: "Today the theatre at its best retains an ecstasy akin to its religious origin." If it did, you could not keep people away. At present, people stay away in tremendous numbers because the theatre never comes within the wide sphere of their normal experience and natural emotions.

THOSE INFALLIBLE GAULS AND HOW THEY ASSEMBLED

Some Rallying Points of the Fifty (and Not Two or Ten) Million

THE Chevalier E. Ray Goetz, idling about the Lido at Venice some two years back, met up with Cole Porter, a young man even then distinguished for the glibness of his rhymes and the sorcery of his rhythms. Mr. Goetz, resting momentarily on his theatrical oars, was on one of his periodic hegiras through the more esthetic show places of Continental Europe, while Mr. Porter was fretting in his own villa, hard by the Lido. Cosmopolites both, their meeting seemed casual enough until Mr. Goetz undertook to investigate Mr. Porter's patent peevishness.

Of all things, Mr. Porter was annoyed with the theatre, and specifically the theatre as it then and now exists in the land of the free and frequently brave. Though his "Old Fashioned Garden" had been caroled throughout the length and breadth of this great democracy, the Porter tunes and lyrics had not been successively embroidered into any of the extravagant musicales that give forth a bouncing blue flame in these parts at $6 the bounce. Mr. Porter was all for sacking the theatre, great as was his devotion to it, because of the indifferent acclaim accorded his cadences. Mr. Porter could well afford such a gesture, because he is a wealthy young man who often finds Paris and the Mediterranean resorts more to his taste than the stretches between the Ohio and the Hudson.

But Mr. Goetz had a ready remedy for Mr. Porter's mal de melodie. In so many words he informed Mr. Porter that he was about to present Irene Bordoni in New York in "Paris," and that two or three eloquent and acid lilts were needed to tone up that piece of mischief. Mr. Porter would oblige an old friend, of course. And then Mr. Goetz unveiled to Mr. Porter an idea that had been fomenting in his head for some six months. Mr. Goetz wanted to do a musical comedy in the grand manner with Paris for the locale. How better whet the jaded appetite of Mr. Porter than to suggest that he, the familiar of the boulevards, concoct the tunes? He was the man for the job and he got it.

All this is a preface to the event which transpired on the stage of the Lyric Theatre on Thanksgiving eve, "Fifty Million Frenchmen," in which Mr. Goetz and his associates did what they could to promote the entente cordiale between the sister republics and confute once and for all the theory that Frenchmen can be wrong.

Returning to these shores with the assurance that Mr. Porter was dedicated to the lyrics and music, Mr. Goetz started on the initial blueprints of the production. Irving Berlin, his ear attuned to such gay mêlées, now advanced and suggested that he and Mr. Goetz associate themselves in the Gallic carnival. Mr. Goetz accepted this proposal, but shortly thereafter Mr. Berlin became embraced in the far-reaching tentacles of the cinema and was forced to forego the gay adventure, unless Mr. Goetz could delay the enterprise until such time as Mr. Berlin could wrench Hollywood off his shoulders. Goetz could not countenance this recess and Mr. Berlin suggested his own partner, Sam H. Harris, as a worthy accomplice. Mr. Goetz was agreeable and Mr. Harris was agreeable, but Mr. Harris's previously accepted obligations with players and playwrights voided this promising merger. Mr. Goetz was for repaying Lafayette instanter, and so he proceeded without further ado.

The further ado involved les Frères Warner, those skilled and opulent young men who have quarried so much precious ore out of the talking picture mines. The potentialities of "Fifty Million Frenchmen" appealed to the Warners as a great future in filmdom. They merged with Mr. Goetz in his manipulations and thus there is the hope that when "Fifty Million Frenchmen" has run its course on the stage it will be perpetuated in celluloid.

With Mr. Porter foresworn to the lyrics and music, Mr. Goetz elected Herbert Fields, with such succulent catches as "Dearest Enemy," "Peggy Ann," "A Connecticut Yankee," "Hit the Deck" and "Present Arms," to write the book which was to transport the multitudinous Gauls and their envious American cousins through the Ritz bar, Longchamps, Claridge's and allied resorts.

With Mr. Porter and Mr. Fields both devoted to his cause, Mr. Goetz now made what then seemed a daring, happy choice. He nominated Edgar M. Woolley to direct the unmusical portion of the entertainment; that is, Herbert Fields's story. Mr. Woolley, in the event that you do not know it, was long the director of the Yale University Dramatic Association. But never had he waved his directorial wand over anything so madcap as a musical show. However, like Mr. Goetz, Mr. Porter and Mr. Fields, Mr. Woolley knew his Seine and his Bois and his Eiffel Tower, and he knew how to manoeuvre myriads about a platform. Thus Mr. Woolley. And then from the far fringes of California Mr. Goetz snatched that tapping caballero, Larry Ceballos, to add the zest and juice to the show that come with expert and graceful movement to music.

There remain in the plot, before rehearsals swing into their varied lanes, the important items of scenery and costumes. Inasmuch as the scenes were all to be laid in the historic avenues of Paris, it was quite evident to Mr. Goetz that the man who contrived them for the proscenium and beyond must have something more than a nodding acquaintance with the architecture of the sinful side streets of the French capital. Norman-Bel Geddes is introduced.

And of the costumes that were to reflect the covering for the fanciful if not so fluent Americans who parade from Zelli's to Maxim's and from dusk to daylight, the supervisor was to be James Reynolds. Like Mr. Porter, both Mr. Geddes and Mr. Reynolds were reluctant exiles from the theatre, for they had slaved long in its interests. Mr. Geddes, looking for a more lucrative field, had decided to become an industrial designer. He was fashioning bodies for swanky automobiles and pondering over architectural fancies for the coming World's Fair in Chicago when Mr. Goetz lured him back to the border lights and the floods. Mr. Reynolds had foresworn the acres of the ticket speculators that he might embellish homes of the wealthy with murals.

Thus were assembled the gentlemen who were to let loose the multitudinous Gauls: Porter, Fields, Geddes, Reynolds, Ceballos, Woolley and Goetz. Let the rehearsals start.

The rehearsals started, and with a vengeance. The 150 members of Equity who were to interpret that whole flock of Frenchmen, in the five weeks before they entrained for Boston for what was to be a never-forgotten two weeks out-of-town, went through their répétitions générales on the stages of the Lyric, the Knickerbocker and the Manhattan Opera House. They rehearsed in the lobby of the Selwyn, in the vast expanses of Mecca Temple, in the smoking room of the Apollo and in the aisles of every theatre mentioned in this paragraph.

There came that eventful day, Saturday, Nov. 9, when from the ends of Manhattan were assembled actors, wigs, shoes, properties, drops, sets, platforms, two dogs and a horse, stage hands, musicians, managers and minor managers, and stage managers, directors and sub-directors, and Goetz and Porter and Fields and Geddes and Woolley and Ceballos, their heirs, their assigns and their acolytes—all these were assembled and the great trek to Boston started.

"Fifty Million Frenchmen" was scheduled to regale the cultured citizenry of Boston with its first flourish on Monday night, Nov. 11. It is a historic fact that its first curtain crept up on Thursday night, Nov. 14. And what, one asks, caused this great delay? But if one does ask, one should take care not to ask Goetz or Porter or Fields or

THE WEEK'S EVENTS

DIANA—Tomorrow night at the Longacre Theatre. This is a play about which considerable has already been written, the main point being that it is based on incidents in the life of Isadora Duncan. Irving Kaye Davis is the author, and Mary Nash will have the principal rôle. Also in the cast will be Jefferson de Angelis and John Craig.

THE NOVICE AND THE DUKE—Tomorrow night at the Assembly Theatre. It turns out that this play is Shakespeare's "Measure for Measure," which has been subjected to "modern arrangement." Chief among the players will be Anne Shoemaker, Thais Lawton, A. P. Kaye, Leo G. Carrol and Leonard Mudie.

FAMILY AFFAIRS—Tuesday night at Maxine Elliott's Theatre. Being Billie Burke in a comedy by Earle Crooker and Lowell Brentano, two of the three authors of "Zeppelin." It is quite a while since Miss Burke has had a good play, and the reports of this one are encouraging.

MICHAEL AND MARY—Tuesday night at the Charles Hopkins Theatre. The leisurely Mr. Hopkins now comes along with another comedy by A. A. Milne, whose official producer he seems to be in this country. Henry Hull and Harry Beresford will head the cast.

GOSSIP OF THE RIALTO

Catching the Overflow—Miss Dickson Pays A Visit—Straightening Out the Hemingway Matter

THEY figure things closely in this business. There is, for example, the booking of Mr. Belasco's new play into the Hudson Theatre. The Hudson is in the same Forty-fourth Street block as the Belasco—these are, as a matter of fact, the only playhouses in the block. Mr. Belasco is said to feel that the Hudson, in recent months, has been capturing much of the turnaway from "It's a Wise Child"—and there you have the reason for the booking. . . . The play in question is something from the Hungarian, and the name of it is "Blind Window." It is due on Christmas Eve.

Dorothy Dickson, who used to dance here with Carl Hyson, is visiting the town at present. She has been playing on the London stage this long time and is a great favorite over there. She will go back presently to appear in the new Cochran revue. . . . Irving Berlin, who used to be a New York boy, is another visitor to the town at present. His regular business these days is motion pictures, and he will go back to the Coast in another week or so.

Those two items about possible Hemingway plays which appeared in this column a week ago must now be boiled down to one. Mr. Woods, who is now on the water, is bringing back not a play by Mr. Hemingway but merely permission to have a dramatization made of "A Farewell to Arms." This dramatization, in turn, will be done by Laurence Stallings, if he hasn't already done it. Mr. Hemingway stipulates that he would like to see the manuscript when it is finished, and that sounds like a not unreasonable request.

Mr. Woods's next venture, of course, will be the Preston Sturges play, "Recapture." It has to do with the endeavors of a young couple to recapture the love that had been theirs in the beginning, and its scenes—its later ones, at all events—are laid just outside of Paris. As originally written Mr. Sturges caused his heroine to commit suicide, but he is said to have been prevailed upon to conclude matters more happily. . . . The play contains about four rôles of equal importance—and that, they say, is the reason why Elsie Ferguson has decided that she would rather not be in it.

The scenes of Rachel Crothers's new one, "Anchors Aweigh," are laid aboard a vessel bound for South America. . . . There was much complaining on the part of theatrical folk about last Monday night's business in the playhouses.

The ticket brokers, impractical fellows that they are, have purchased some 550 seats nightly for the next twenty weeks of Mr. Donahue's show, "Sons o' Guns."

A new cooperative group, headed by Leo Bulgakov of "Street Scene" and Walter Abel, will take over the Waldorf early next month. They will start off lightly with "The Lower Depths" and "The Sea Gull," and if the first month is promising they will take the theatre for a solid year. So reads the option, at all events.

The Belasco Theatre in Washington closed for good and all last night, and Shubert-booked shows in that town will now have to go to Poli's, which is the longest theatre in this or any other world.

Harland Dixon, as well as Irene Delroy, will go into "Top Speed" in Philadelphia tomorrow night. Mr. Dixon will probably do some sort of dancing. . . . George Abbott, here from the films, was called in for some last-minute revision and restaging of "Headquarters." The gossipers had it that he labored five days at a daily wage of $1,000.

Mr. Abbott, by the way, will probably concern himself with two plays of his own while here. One, written with S. K. Lauren, is called "Those We Love," and it will be produced by Mr. Blatt of "Subway Express," mayhap with Fay Bainter in it. The other, originally the work of Marie Baumer, is called "Blind Spot." . . . Speaking of Miss Bainter, the Shuberts have decided not to produce "Promenade" after all. This was a play for which Miss Bainter was talked about—at least in last Sunday's TIMES.

Out in Los Angeles there is a play of which Sidney Toler is part author—which serves to recall the fact that Mr. Toler, while best known as an actor, used to write plays by the bushel. Several years ago Mr. Toler put the number at seventy-five, and you can't tell what has happened since. Many of them Mr. Toler produced in the years when he was a prominent stock actor, and several have been given Broadway production—the last of them having been "The Exile," five or six years ago. . . . Mr. Toler's collaborator on the Los Angeles play is William McNally, a mid-West newspaper man who has written several plays. He works on The Minneapolis Tribune, and it's hard to figure just when Mr. Toler and he got together.

"Waterloo Bridge" is reported to be a bit shorter than the conventions demand, and accordingly Mr. Sherwood is said to be lengthening it. It sounds like a hard job.

Mr. White's new musical comedy, still without a title, will open in Boston on Jan. 20 and is due in this town two weeks thereafter. The situation is somewhat complicated by the fact that Mr. White himself dances nightly in his own "Scandals," and, as every one knows, a new musical comedy can use the services of its producer during the break-in period. Mr. White, however, says that his show will be ready for the public when it opens in Boston, and that he will stay right in New York. . . . There is talk about this show coming to the Selwyn, a booking which would mean the transfer of "Wake Up and Dream," which will be occupying the Selwyn at that time.

"Wretched Woman," Philip Moeller's play, is being temporarily held up because of the necessity for cast changes. Mr. Moeller, who has been busy in Boston with "Meteor," will be in town tomorrow to take up the question of a new, or at least partially new, cast.

Mr. Leslie's "International Revue" is in rehearsal at last. It is still more or less scheduled to come to the New Amsterdam late in January . . . It is said that Mr. Leslie has an overabundance of black-out sketches and is thinking of just never turning on the lights at all.

They are looking for a new prima donna for "Nina Rosa," the Romberg operetta. It is due here New Year's week.

A week ago Madge Kennedy seemed likely to appear in a mystery play called "Hide in the Dark"—a dramatization, of course, of the like-named novel. Now it seems that that project is off, and the tale runs that Miss Kennedy may go out to the Coast to act in one or more of her earlier pieces. Mr. Wagner, her producer, will set out for the West in a few weeks, and says that he will start operating on a big scale in San Francisco next month.

No sooner will Mr. and Mrs. Lunt have returned to these parts than they will start rehearsing the Turgenev comedy, "A Month in the Country." It is a consuming master, the theatre, but you meet a lot of interesting people. . . . Well, some, anyhow.

The suspense is over about Mr. Jessel—he will act here again in the next few months. The play, as long rumored and re-rumored, will be by Bertram Bloch, (and probably Mr. Jessel, too, before it's all over). Its name is "P. S. He Got the Job," and it deals with biblical times, although not, they say, in biblical language. It will be coming along late in January, or maybe in February.

Mr. Gillette's great success at the New Amsterdam continues to worry Mr. Tyler, and the chances are that the engagement will have to be prolonged. Offhand this looks like nothing to worry about, but the fact is that Mr. Gillette's season can be just so long and that the New York engagement can be lengthened only at the cost of giving up other valuable time. This, coupled with the fact that a good deal of printing has already flown under the bridge, or whatever the saying is, is what gives theatrical managers gray hairs. Or none at all.

Mr. Tyler has another stellar project in his mind. Mrs. Fiske, Mr. Skinner and one other, he says, will come together in the Spring to appear in a classic. At the moment Mr. Skinner has Hollywood plans.

A play called "Escapade," by Laurence Eyre, went into rehearsal last week. It was first tried out in the Spring. . . . And somebody is producing "Temptations of 1930," with a certain Mrs. Browning in the cast. Heigh-ho!

Into the silences went quite a number of entertainments last night. There was "The Channel Road," which put up a good but losing fight at the Plymouth, and there were "The Amorous Antic," "The Humbug," "Veneer," "The Patriarch" and "A Primer for Lovers," all short-lived. Mr. Hampden decided not to act "Caponsacchi" any more, and "The Silver Tassie" finished down in Greenwich Village. . . . And then there was "Whirlpool," which waited not for Saturday night, but closed on Wednesday.

MORE ABOUT THE DRAMA AND ITS MANIFESTATIONS

"Meteor" Opens in Boston

UNTHWARTED by anything that may recently have happened to "Strange Interlude" in Boston, the Theatre Guild last week favored that city with the first performance on any stage of "Meteor," the S. N. Behrman play which finds Alfred Lunt and Lynn Fontanne starring busily in the drama which will bring them back to town during the week of Dec. 23. To H. T. Parker, representing The Boston Transcript, it was noticeable that the comment "in the entr'actes circled over the performance rather than the piece," but Mr. Behrman's story is, willy-nilly, as follows:

"It is embodied in Raphael Lord, who assumed for himself that magniloquent cognomen, and of whose past, before we discover him at the New England college, we learn little. By inference he was obscurely born and reared; by his own account vagabonded the roads and drifted into jail. There he read a book by a professor at the college; believed it inspiration, had come to sit at the feet of the author—only to be disillusioned, since the wise man had nothing more to teach.

"Therefore, Lord is leaving the college, but with the half-won love of an engaging girl and after the routing of a rival even to death. For in overt quarrel, close to fisticuffs, the other youth's weak heart had failed him. From incident to incident we mark Lord, through Mr. Lunt's acting, as strung taut and restless, prowling the room; abrupt of speech himself, quick to check others in speech half begun; bearing down men, women and things in overweening self-confidence and strength of will; possessed already of supreme faith in his future; endowed, moreover, with a singular insight. . . .

"So much for Mr. Behrman's act of premise, cut to the tingling quick of essentials and background. Five years pass and we proceed into his act of revelation and transition. Out of the library in the professor's house, redolent, as Mr. Sovey sets it, of sheltered, tranquil, cultivated life, we pass into the shimmering splendors of a Venetian salon in a Fifth Avenue mansion. There dwells Raphael Lord as man of power and possessions, having achieved the will to both. There beside him is the girl, now half-willing wife. Thither comes the professor for the mild exchange of talk between two opposed temperaments. Thither again the youth of the college household, once aspiring to a Doctorate of Philosophy, now succumbed to Lord as a sort of secretary-manager. There, finally, we rediscover from Act I the brother of the dead rival—morose, short-spoken, at heart vindictive.

"This way and that Mr. Behrman turns the glass upon Lord. We see and hear him busy with plans for his Mexican properties—now selfish and brutal to yield him money and power; again visionary and ideal as of one who would set the mark of a new era upon his world; always nothing daunted by obstacle interposed or menace impending. We see him also in gentler exercises of his instant and all-conquering will. He notes a pleasing house and buys it forthwith for the newly wed youth. He thrusts, with rough-coated amiability, through talk with the professor. Interludes these in the multifold life of a man of power, here, there and everywhere, upon all who serve and all who oppose, imposing a domineering, unscrupulous will. Long since his wife discovered the barren waste of such living. . . In quality an act of mixed matter, of revealing definition, of dramatic movement only when events in Mexico begin to threaten and the ominous, revengeful Maxwell is dispatched to adjust them.

"Last the act of climax, two years on. In Mexico Maxwell has brought about the confusions and defeat that he would compass; returns to cast them at Lord; shakes him, yet is brushed away. The wife can endure no more; in bitterness departs. Again the egotistic will is stance and brace. The secretarial youth bursts in with grave tidings. For third occasion Lord musters and masters himself, baleful. We leave him at the telephone calling his chief antagonist; by harsh insistence driving him to his will. Isolation has but stripped away veneers. If indomitable egotism may avert ruin, his hands still hold victory. The act, as it stands, is summary, arbitrary, now knife-edge, again bludgeon."

THE COMEDIE HARBORS A PASTORAL

PARIS, Nov. 20.

IN the work of the younger playwrights there is none that exceeds in charm that of Marcel Achard. If he has not the grace, distinction or literary quality of Jean Giraudoux, the pitiless sense of the comedy of human character of Stève Passeur, the sheer dramatic force and the pessimism of Lenormand, and little trace of the rather anxiously modern emotional preoccupations of Simon Gantillon, there is in him nevertheless a childlike and merry fancy and a wayward human tenderness which give him a special place of his own. These qualities, which were to be found in his first piece, "Marlbrouck," when Louis Jouvet produced it a few years ago, were still further developed in "Jean de la lune," which the same manager presented last Summer.

It was quite fair that Marcel Achard should receive the more or less official hall-mark of having a play produced at the Comédie Française, although it may be mentioned that none of the four other playwrights that I have mentioned has received this honor, doubtless because they have not sought it. That the Comédie Française, in one of its occasional efforts to keep abreast of the modern movement, should turn to Marcel Achard, and that his play, "La Belle Marinière," should have been produced there last week, is as it should be.

At the same time, there was something wrong about the whole business, and the notices of the French critics upon the production show that in their several ways they felt that something was wrong. The characters in the play belong to that not inconsiderable floating population—floating in the literal as well as the figurative sense—which lives and works on the barges of the extensive river and canal system of France. Its title indicates the fact, for as a "marin" is a sailor, so a "marinier" is a bargee. They are rough working people, and the story of the play, in its humors as well as its sentiment, is what a generation or two ago would have been called a story of low life. Why was it that such a play did not seem right at the Comédie Française?

One critic suggests that it is because the actors are so entirely unused to this sort of thing. He recalls Marie Antoinette and her courtiers playing at shepherds and shepherdesses on the toy farm, whose ruins can still be seen at the Petit Trianon, with sheep which had been carefully combed in the early morning and had had their teeth brushed by a majordomo. According to him, the quiet river, to whose bank the barge is represented as being moored, was made by the actors to suggest the Grand Canal at Versailles rather than an ordinary canal of vulgar commerce. It was foolish, he thinks, of the Comédie Française to be jealous of the modest successes of small theatres, and to want to be modern and popular and comic. He thanks heaven that the Comédie Française can never succeed in being vulgar. It should leave that sort of thing to Mistinguett or Dorville, who do it much better. It should have realized that the elegant personages in this play, with their noble sentiments and subconscious emotions, really belonged to a beautifully appointed drawing-room in the Avenue du Bois, and should have persuaded the author to place them there.

Here, perhaps, we are near the real trouble; for there is a real trouble, and the play is not one of Marcel Achard's happiest. He never seems to have been able to forget that he was writing for the Comédie Française, and that he must keep his play at the literary and rhetorical elevation that a Comédie Française audience expects. His bargees talk like the peasants of George Sand, or rather, they analyze their feelings with the detailed introspection of the most self-conscious and intellectually developed characters in a modern middle-class comedy.

It is all very well for the defenders of Marcel Achard to say that the subtlety of emotions depends upon individuality and not upon education. That is true, but the fluency with which those emotions can be expressed does not. These same defenders argue that Marcel Achard places his characters on canal barges, because today that slow-moving life is the only one left in which they could have the sort of leisure which in old days was the privilege of kings and aristocrats.

However, if we ask why the old authors chose people of high degree for their characters, we shall perhaps find that it was without any anxiety for verisimilitude, but because among them alone would there be no disparity between the persons and the exalted language which, in order to express his ideas, the author wanted to use. The more the characters belong to the common people, the more inarticulate they must be if they are not to offend an audience's instinctive sense of reality.

The story to which Marcel Achard devotes so much temperamental analysis is simple enough. It opens with the modest feast on the barge, at which Pierre is celebrating his marriage to Marinette. There is a comic father and also a comic soldier, on leave, as the audience at once recognized, from one of Courteline's barracks. There is Pierre's young sister, Mique, and there is Pierre's great friend, Silvestre, whose virtues Pierre has so persistently and enthusiastically praised to Marinette before his arrival that she is prejudiced against him before she sees him. The experienced playgoer knows what this prejudice means. Marinette and Silvestre fall in love with one another. At first they do not realize it. When they do, Silvestre makes up his mind that it is his duty as a friend to go away, but not before he and Pierre have a violent quarrel about the death of a horse, a quarrel which may be taken either as representing their subconscious antagonism over the affairs of the heart or their instinctive sense that the things of daily life and work are really the only ones important enough to quarrel over.

Silvestre turns up again. He has been missed by Pierre as a friend, by Mique, who is openly in love with him, and by Marinette, who is so secretly. From this point to that at which Silvestre, after explaining the whole situation to Pierre, goes off with Marinette, the play becomes more and more unreal, as the characters become more and more analytical and introspective. When Silvestre, about to depart with the lady, explains to the forsaken husband that he is going to be just as unhappy, the psychological tangle becomes inextricable.

Marie Bell, Brunot and Yonnel play the chief parts with distinction, subtlety and romantic grace, even if they never quite suggest common working people, and even if they never quite recapture that easy gayety and broad sense of the comic which, as someone said, Molière gave to the Comédie Française when he founded it, but which the company has never had since then.

WHAT ABOUT VAUDEVILLE?

PALACE—Jack Dempsey, remembered as having retired from the ring to become a stage star under Mr. Belasco's tutelage, is up to histrionics again, this time in a one-act play by Willard Mack. Esther Ralston of the films is making one of those personal appearances, with songs and dances, and Ken Murray and his partners, the Charlestons, are back in their amusing routine. There are six other acts.

RIVERSIDE — Henry Santrey's "Soldiers of Fortune" comprise an orchestra, singers and dancers, and they will be at this house throughout the week. Cullen Landis, sometimes of the cinema, appears in a one-act play, and Billy and Elsa Newell present their patter act.

HIPPODROME — The Honorable Mr. Wu and his Chinese Show Boat are the current invaders here, with four acts supporting them.

EIGHTY-FIRST STREET—Agnes Ayres headlines here until Wednesday in a musical something called "A Night in Cairo." Jack Norworth and Dorothy Adelphi will be featured later in the week.

PROCTOR'S FIFTY - EIGHTH STREET—Ida May Chadwick's "Dixie Daisies" (they're Jubilee Singers) are the featured performers early in the week. Lillian Morton will open on Wednesday for a three-day engagement.

PROCTOR'S EIGHTY - SIXTH STREET—Jack Norworth and Dorothy Adelphi, Glenn and Jenkins, and others will be here until Wednesday. The new bill will feature Lulu McConnell, still playing her farcical bridge game.

E. F. ALBEE (Brooklyn)—Fred Waring's Pennsylvanians, at the Palace no later than last week, are the principal stage attraction here, and they bring with them the winsome Dorothy Lee.

TWO COMEDIES GO ASTRAY

London Sees a Pair of Pieces That Might Have Been Bright, but Aren't

LONDON, Nov. 21.

THE theatrical practitioners have been industriously practicing. A few weeks ago, encouraged by what seemed to be a positive revival in the theatre and by what was without question a wave of commercial prosperity, I put forward in these columns a hopeful theory. The managers, I suggested, seemed at last to be learning that, whether the piece of their choice was tragedy, comedy or farce, the one fatal policy was that of "playing down" to the audience. My theory stands; the policy is evidently fatal; but I was wrong when I said that the managers had accepted this truth. The theatrical practitioners are still playing down and we have suffered in consequence.

A new play called "Third Time Lucky," by Arnold Ridley, who wrote "The Ghost Train," has appeared at the Ambassadors Theatre. It is a farcical comedy, and there were members of the audience who enjoyed it uproariously—so uproariously that their laughter at short range was one of the major discomforts of the evening, making me feel as the members of the Light Brigade must have felt when riding hopelessly into the cannonade whose thunders Tennyson has recorded. But the gallant soldiers were more fortunate than I.

"Theirs not to reason why,
Theirs but to do and die . . ."

They were, in brief, exempted from the responsibility of criticism, whereas I have to decide how and why Mr. Ridley made such a sorry muddle of his play.

At the outset it was not without promise. We were introduced to the rector of Stoke Fernie and his ward, Jennifer. He was a nervous, slightly pedantic man, but he was not a caricature and I began to like him and be interested in him. He had a farcical housekeeper who ought to have been a warning; he was visited by a large, breathless, talkative parishioner who ought to have dashed my hope of reasonable comedy; but hope was stubborn and when the rector began to propose marriage to his ward I wished him luck. The proposal did not go far. Before Jennifer had even understood what the rector was driving at, she told him that she had just become engaged to another man and asked for a paternal blessing. The rector did his best to stifle his own feelings and to behave as paternally as possible. Then Jennifer told him that she was being blackmailed. She had written some indiscreet love letters to a certain Captain Crowther, who was now putting them up for ransom. Very well, said the rector, I will go to see Captain Crowther. Absurd! said Jennifer, you aren't a man of the world and he is. But the rector persisted in his heroism and I confess that I looked forward with curiosity to seeing how this obscure, retiring clergyman would fare in a battle of wits with one who was evidently an accomplished and experienced scoundrel. Here, indeed, there might have been a genuine clash of character and comedy of merit.

But Mr. Ridley decided otherwise. He was seeking to provoke loud and easy laughter, and, instead of a battle of wits, we were given a scene in which the rector, left alone in the villain's flat, tried to break open the safe with a penknife and suddenly found himself the shocked and unwilling ally of a real burglar, professionally equipped.

At this point comedy went out of the play and never returned. There was an abundance of tying people up in chairs, of climbing in and out of the safe and in and out of the window. We saw the rector "holding up" the villain with a toy pistol; we saw how he escaped with the wrong papers, and how, in the third act, all was made well by the appearance of the real burglar disguised as an archdeacon. This was farce in the tradition of "Charley's Aunt," with none of the speed and ingenious invention which make "Charley's Aunt" still tolerable. Some of the "situations" had a kind of crude humor; it is possible that outside of London there may be old-fashioned audiences to find pleasure in them; but the play is uncertain of its mood and conventional in its methods. I cannot pretend that, except in moments during the first act, I enjoyed it.

Benn Levy's play "Art and Mrs. Bottle" is a greater disappointment because we expected more of it. It was chosen by Irene Vanbrugh for her return to the London stage after a long absence, and the audience assembled eagerly. Once again the first act was full of hope. The scene was a studio in which a brother and sister, Michael and Judy Bottle, were painting from a model. Michael and Judy and Sonia, the model, were all good figures of comedy—Michael an impulsive, uncouth artist; Judy passionate and headstrong, but charming; and Sonia an extremely refined and respectable tradesman's daughter. Into this group come first Mr. Bottle, a solid business man; then the mother of Michael and Judy, who ran away from her husband twenty years ago with an artist who almost at once abandoned her. She has been living all these years as the mistress of some vague, cosmopolitan prince; he is dead, and she has now come to see her children. And almost the first thing she learns about them is that Judy is contemplating running away with the same artist who betrayed her mother twenty years ago.

Not a startlingly brilliant act but at least a fair opening with easy and entertaining dialogue. Thereafter Mr. Levy takes the bit in his teeth. Mrs. Bottle, of whom we were all expecting a lightly ingenious treatment of the problem before her, goes off into a tirade about love and art, which are, she says, delusions. Art is an empty fraud. Michael must abandon it and enter his father's business as a sanitary engineer. Love is a fraud. Judy must be rescued from the wicked artist by an exposure of him as the callous and selfish creature that he is, and, since even that does not deter her, he himself—with a quite incredible reversal of conscience—must reject her.

If Mr. Levy with real seriousness had studied the mother's embittered hatred of art and love, or if, in the tradition of Tolstoy, he had persuaded us to accept a spiritual conversion in her, all might have been well. If, on the other hand, he had kept the whole play on the plane of superficial comedy, where it began, again all might have been well. But he mixes frivolity with solemnity so that you can neither enjoy the first nor for an instant believe in the second. Irene Vanbrugh is one of the most accomplished actresses in the theatre, but she is powerless to give to Mrs. Bottle any semblance of life. There are fragments of entertainment in her part and in several others; the cast, which includes Robert Loraine, is extremely good; but the evening as a whole is disastrous, the play losing itself in a whirl of rhetoric and contrived theatricalism.

ON THE WESTERN FRONT

LOS ANGELES, Dec. 4.

IT WAS probably inevitable that sooner or later an adult piece of work, done with capable players, would be presented to the theatregoers of this Florence of the Western Hemisphere, but the opening of "Among the Married" at the Majestic on Sunday night was nevertheless a surprise to almost everybody. Even Hubert J. Metuchin, a local critic and wag temporarily without a vehicle, who had practically decided to turn his back on the local theatre and devote the rest of his life to reading some of the books he claims to have read, was moved to applause as the final curtain fell and was heard to remark that too many people read too many books anyhow. It is probably the extreme local shortage of intelligent theatrical diversion that has made Mr. Metuchin a bit hysterical toward the new offering, but it did seem like an exceedingly first-rate piece of work here, regardless of how negligible it may have appeared to a New York season that has been able to boast of "A Ledge," "First Mortgage," and all the other plays that make the New Yorker's evening just one endless round of theatregoing delight.

Indicating more clearly even than the Spanish-American War that there is neither East nor West, North nor South, but just one great big unified America with a common denominator of thought, the local critics have made lavish reference to the fact that poor old Vincent Lawrence's talents seem to include only the writing of extraordinary dialogue with little ability at play carpentry. Mr. Metuchin, in one of his rare moments of rage, thinks it is high time to stop regarding the writing of dialogue as something always entirely apart from the writing of a play, and to begin instantly to accord a little more attention to a man who can write two and a half acts of a superb play without ever falling to the level of the twaddle that is considered play carpentry among the rest of the dramaturgic boys and girls.

Except for its peculiar desire to have it known to Los Angeles that "Among the Married" is still playing to capacity houses in New York, the local production is decidedly satisfying throughout. Edward Everett Horton, producer as well as star, has discarded the little things that have caused him to be rightly regarded as the reigning stock favorite of the Pacific Southwest, and emerges as a deft and genuinely resourceful actor. Florence Eldridge gives the expert and glamourous performance that even more enlightened audiences than those of Los Angeles have rightly come to expect of her. A particularly interesting feature of the evening, moreover, is the first appearance on the legitimate stage of Mary Astor, hitherto best known as one of the darlings of the silent screen. Miss Astor's performance is exquisite, and it would pay more than one manager who yearns for open-air golf in January, and who for this or that reason finds Palm Beach out of bounds, to make the perilous trip westward and cast an eye on Miss Astor.

"Bird in Hand" has been and gone, with little activity at the box-office, despite the great amount of praise from the few who found their way to the theatre. . . . There is talk of a local production of "Lulu Belle," featuring Nina May McKinney, the young negress who was so enthusiastically hailed in King Vidor's "Hallelujah." . . . A production of Ernst Vajda's "Fata Morgana" at the Vine Street Theatre is in the cards for the Christmas holidays. . . . Marjorie Rambeau is to be seen at the moment in Lynn Starling's "In His Arms."

A new play called "Maternally Yours," by Clarence O'Dell Miller and Ole Ness, will open at the Hollywood Music Box late this month. Mr. Metuchin is trying to organize a conspiracy of silence. . . . "Bad Babies," which has had police trouble recently, has reopened at the Figueroa Playhouse. . . . "The Passing of the Third Floor Back" is running at The Actors, which used to be the Orange Grove, it would be well for people to remember who like to keep their card indexes up to date. . . . Mr. Metuchin nearly had the fright of his life Tuesday night when he thought he saw Louis Mann in the seat in front of him at the boxing bouts at the Olympic. Mr. Metuchin really had the fright of his life when he found out it was actually Louis Mann. Mr. Metuchin is trying to borrow money from the Mooney Defense Fund to thwart any attempt to revive "Milgrim's Progress" in Los Angeles.

A COUPLE OF PLAYWRIGHT FELLOWS

THE prospect of having a play on Broadway slew David Freedman, and he became Eddie Cantor's ghost, the "as-told-to" author of Mr. Cantor's well-known biography, "My Life Is in Your Hands." Somewhat before that, Mr. Freedman had written "Mendel, Inc.," a play which hurried from between the covers of his novel, "Mendel Marantz," and eventually found itself in its present location at the Sam H. Harris Theatre.

In his brief career as a writer Mr. Freedman has sensibly learned to be surprised at nothing. Thus, as a child, he won all the spelling contests in the district, and has now turned out to be a writer of dialect stories. Thus, too, he earned a Phi Beta Kappa key at City College, promptly pawned it (the key) and almost immediately became a newspaper man on The Mail. His father was a journalist, his grandfather was a shoemaker, his great-grandfather was a tavern keeper, and the punch came from somewhere.

Regarding the character of Mendel, whom Alexander Carr impersonates nightly, Mr. Freedman finds that it evolved from the quite endless dinner table discussions of his youth. "What is love?" the younger Freedman would ask, and his elder would commence a two-hour explanation, starting, "Now take a potato for instance." It always turned out that a potato and love were alike because both had eyes but were blind. As far as the theatre was concerned, the only trouble was that the question and the answer were always too far apart. But when Mr. Freedman learned to bring them closer together he became a playwright.

IN case there should ever be any inquiry into the matter, let it be stated here, now and without equivocation, that this Dan Jarrett, whose new comedy, "Salt Water," is giving Frank Craven the opportunity to perform some Frank Craven antics up at Mr. Golden's theatre, is a stage child. It was, so the records insist, the quaint custom of his father to carry him on and off stage in child parts when Jarrett, père, was acting with E. H. Sothern. Subsequently the young man had a period of service with the late James K. Hackett, playing juvenile rôles.

There was a time when it was his ambition to be referred to as "Dr. Jarrett," and to that end he almost finished his medical education. There are likewise references in his past to the occasion when he joined the Canadian Royal Mounted. Instead of getting his man, he got into the midst of a struggling company of actors. This chance encounter brought on an attack of the old nostalgia, and soon he was back on Broadway. It was not for long—he was caught up in the war fervor and the Medical Corps of the navy gave him the opportunity to put some previously acquired knowledge into practice.

After the armistice, he went back to the grease paint and footlights racket—this time in vaudeville, where he both wrote and acted in comedy skits. "Salt Water" is his first Broadway play.

AN ENCORE FOR THE MERRY WIDOW

WERE he never to have composed another lilting note, Franz Lehar would have been deemed a success for his share of that October night in 1907 when the late Henry W. Savage brought "The Merry Widow" light-footed to the expectant stage of the New Amsterdam. The erstwhile bandmaster of an Austrian regiment, the author of many another tuneful piece, it remained for Lehar to be introduced to America by that single song whose echoes, with those of "The Blue Danube," have always wandered vagrantly in the sentimental places and are now to be heard at Seventh Avenue and Fifty-ninth Street.

Fewer Americans saw Europe then than now, but nevertheless the cognoscenti had come home in convincing numbers to whistle that waltz for months before Colonel Savage, intent upon the public weal, fetched over the rest of the operetta too. So "The Merry Widow" opened, as reported in this journal, before "one of the most brilliant audiences which have attended a New York first night in recent years," an audience whose "applause was almost terrifying in its intensity."

It was also a reception whose cordiality was not unmixed with doubts. "The Merry Widow" was presented here in an English version which dropped "a few of the suggestive lines and situations accepted in Vienna and Munich," but was still so piquant as to suggest to Charles Pike Sawyer that "even now the moral atmosphere is by no means fragrant." Certainly there was nothing so dashing in town; not in "The Great White Way," in which Jefferson De Angelis, Blanche Ring and Alexander Carr were triple-starring over at the Casino, nor in "The Great Divide," piloted into its second year at Daly's by Margaret Anglin and Henry Miller. But the public coyly liked "The Merry Widow" and for fifty-two weeks addressed itself to the box-office for 421 performances that grossed more than a million dollars.

Seven prima donnas, beginning with Ethel Jackson, sang the title rôle during the run. On the final night of the engagement real champagne was opened and consumed on the stage in the Maxim's scene, while the audience was distractingly presented with leaflets about the operetta. At the 275th performance a matinee crowd rioted as 1,300 women sought to carry away 1,200 souvenir Merry Widow hats (white, two feet in diameter, and "drooping like mushrooms," even before the battle started). A million copies of the waltz had been sold. A youth named Donald Brian, lately of the cast of "Florodora," played Prince Danilo, and from his current rôle in "How's Your Health?" he may look back on that engagement as having established his career. Plainly, when it finally closed, "The Merry Widow" had made history.

There have been entrancing operettas that dimmed as they vanished into the past, to be brought back a little condescendingly and not without tender amusement. But neither "The Merry Widow" nor its composer has rested on old laurels. Indeed, Lehar once complained to interviewers that the waltz had become "a veritable persecution" as it followed him in his travels, and that in Venice, five years after it was first heard in 1905, "the most unpromising looking people" whistled it at him wherever he went. This anguish should by now have been a little assuaged by royalties which have mounted to millions, and Lehar has continued productively as a composer. But periodically it is "The Merry Widow" that comes back, often in Europe and once in New York between its première and the current engagement at Jolson's Theatre. In 1921, again at the New Amsterdam Theatre and again under the aegis of Colonel Savage, it was presented, this time with Lydia Lipkowska as the buoyant Sonia and Reginald Pasch as her Prince Danilo.

As for Lehar himself, his "Where the Lark Sings," "The Count of Luxemburg," "The Blue Mazur" and "Alone at Last" testify that Vienna is to him unfailingly the same enchanting source. And though he has written much, he has destroyed perhaps as much more, and without compunction, because, as he has said, "I know there is always more where that came from."

Even up Tin Pan Alley way the boys have to admire that spirit.

MARION GERING, PRODUCER

SOME five years ago a young man bent on studying the American theatre and bearing in his inner coat pocket letters of introduction calculated to pave the way for such study stepped from a liner onto United States soil for the first time. The letters, which announced him as Marion Maximilianovitch Gering, were from persons of importance in Russia, but they had the misfortune to be addressed, in all seriousness, to such mythical officials as the Commissioner of National Education and the Director of Theatre Arts. Mr. Gering was completely disillusioned when he found that in this country the government did not support the arts and that these high officials were non-existent, a matter which is mentioned here as one of the events leading up to the recent production of "Broken Dishes," which, for purposes of identification, is the Martin Flavin play which has Donald Meek in it.

Obviously, this slight set-back did not cause the young man to return to his native Russia. Also, as is equally obvious to any one who has encountered his name in print recently, he dropped the middle affliction, and is known now merely as Marion Gering, a name which explains the occasional letters addressed to him as "Miss."

Gering was born in Rostov-on-Don in the south of Russia, and started out to be a physician, studying medicine for all of seven months. The presence in his city of a motion picture company from Petrograd, which was using one of the university buildings temporarily, lured him from medicine. He turned movie actor—he was little more than sixteen then, by the way—and after two years as a mime became successively assistant director and director. In Petrograd, where he removed, Vsevelod Meyerhold saw his work and invited him to come to Moscow. Permission for that change was refused by the Soviet government, whereat a kind friend issued a slightly faked release and Gering went anyway.

With Meyerhold, Gering started all over again, a condition which was of no great material importance to him inasmuch as two months later Meyerhold lost his government job and his theatre and was forced to carry on his work in a small studio. For several years Gering worked with Meyerhold through various ups and downs, becoming his assistant when Meyerhold obtained a theatre again, and going to work as a clerk for six months when once again the director's subsidy was withdrawn. During those months rehearsals were conducted at night until all was in readiness for Meyerhold to re-establish himself, which he finally did.

In 1923 the question of whether the Russian theatre would be influenced by the East or the West was agitating some of the Moscow intelligentsia. Gering was sent to Siberia, Mongolia and Tibet to see if anything was going on there which would leave its impress on the future Russian drama. The following year he was sent to this country to study conditions, bearing the aforementioned letters of introduction.

On his way here, in Berlin, he had fallen in with some one who had given him a letter to what purported to be a big producing company in Milwaukee. When all else failed in New York, Gering decided to go to that city, only to learn on arrival there that the alleged producing company was really a burlesque troupe. Whereupon, since his native town of Rostov-on-Don was known to the more forward-looking of its citizens as the Russian Chicago, he decided to go to the real Chicago. Two weeks after his arrival there, he organized, in a converted stable on the south side, the Coach House Players, whom he directed in several one-act plays. Since he knew no English, the direction was accomplished by means of gesture, grunts and odd phrases of German and French. Subsequently, under the auspices of the Chicago Society, he put a semi-professional group through its paces in Andreyev's "Life of Man," which was played in Yiddish, a language of which he was as ignorant as English.

Back in Chicago after a brief trip East, Gering produced Georg Keiser's "Gas" at the Goodman Memorial Theatre in what he called "the neo-realistic manner"—a manner which Ashton Stevens said left him dizzy, but which inspired Kenneth Macgowan to describe it as "a production of astonishing significance." This led to a plan for a revival at the Greenwich Village Theatre here of O'Neill's "The Hairy Ape," to be directed by Gering in constructivist style, and many letters were exchanged between Macgowan and Gering. Nothing came of the plan, due, apparently, to matters of finance.

Next came the organization of the ambitious Chicago Play Producing Company and an elaborate plan for an exchange of plays between that town and New York. George Abbott's adaptation of "Peripherie," the original of which was seen here under the Reinhardt banner, was actually produced by the Chicago Play Producing Company, in association with Brady and Wiman, but proved a quick failure. Meanwhile actors were being engaged in New York for O'Neill's "Lazarus Laughed," when it was discovered that the funds were all gone. Not unnaturally, the plan was abandoned.

Coming to New York, Gering started, as he had done in Chicago, at a little theatre, the Intimate Playhouse in the Bronx. There he produced "So Am I," which the Shuberts on a cold Winter's night caused to be transferred to the Comedy Theatre, where it ran for a few weeks. Finding that managers were unwilling to trust him with American plays because he was a foreigner, Gering bought the rights to "Skidding," produced it with a partner and directed it himself. The play ran something like a year on Broadway.

"Broken Dishes" came next—a thoroughly American comedy which was extremely well received, although it had been turned down previously by various producers and theatre owners. It was produced as well as directed by Gering, in association would Oscar Serlin, a former Chicago friend and associate. Now he is casting a play called "Lost Sheep," which he will likewise both direct and produce.

When he came to this country Gering was so young that he considered it a handicap and told every one he was 34. Now that he is a little older he does not mind being young, and tells every one that he is 28. This last, although there are not records at hand to authenticate it, is said to be true.

50 Million Frenchmen
and the Critics Can't Be Wrong!

"'Fifty Million Frenchmen' happens to be just the best thing of its sort in seven or so years. That's flinging hoorays to right and left. But 'Fifty Million Frenchmen' can stand them. Everything in it and about it is top notch and pretty nearly unsurpassable, I'll wager. It has funniness and loveliness and—pardon me—chic. I had my best time of the season playing at being the fifty-million-and first Frenchman of this most social, political and musico-theatrical American success."
—Gilbert Gabriel in N. Y. American

"It is brisk, crack-brained, smartly accoutered and modishly salacious."
—J. Brooks Atkinson in the Times

"A hot show they will be calling this exhibit at the Lyric. A swell show, too. Yes, they probably will be calling this one hot—so if it is hot stuff you are looking for, here is unmistakably your dish."
—Burns Mantle in Daily News

"Here is a show that will make you homesick for Paris, and it's grand fun, too. Altogether 'Fifty Million Frenchmen' is thoroughly satisfactory, often uproarious, and a memorable collection of details."
—Robert Littell in The World

"'Fifty Million Frenchmen,' a new E. Ray Goetz musical delight, romped all over the Lyric Theatre platform last evening until it landed securely in the hit division. It is a profane portrait of Paris, but a pippin."
—Walter Winchell in Daily Mirror

"'Fifty Million Frenchmen' is the suavest, wittiest and most urbane musical show in town."
—Richard Watts, Jr., in Herald-Tribune

E. RAY GOETZ presents
A MUSICAL COMEDY TOUR OF PARIS
"50 MILLION FRENCHMEN"
with
WILLIAM GAXTON and GENEVIEVE TOBIN

"Regardless of what it may be that fifty million Frenchmen are wrong about, American playgoers stand no chance of going wrong if they head to the Gay Paree Mr. Goetz is offering them at the Lyric."
—John Mason Brown in Evening Post

"From Montmartre to dawn rights at Les Halle's 'Fifty Million Frenchmen' winds out its plot with great humor, clever tunes and gorgeous dancing, making it end to end a lavish and funny show, welcome addition to the local festivals."
—John Anderson in Evening Journal

"A grand show is on view at the Lyric, and if this sounds like a line written for the press agent, I can't help it. After all, you can't be 'always belittlin'. 'Fifty Million Frenchmen' is as near to a perfect musical as you are likely to meet. I would like to see and hear it all again."
—Gilbert Seldes in the Graphic

"This one, ladies and gentlemen, is for you. In scene, theme and color it is a wisely fashioned bouquet from the boulevards, a Spring Song from Paris. A swift and smooth and elegant show that sets a mark, an enormously high mark, for the season's tune wears."
—Whitney Bolton in Morning Telegraph

"It's as good as a trip to Paris, this lively, breezy, rowdy musical show."
—Charles Darnton in Evening World

"It's a rich, rowdy and resourceful entertainment Mr. E. Ray Goetz has fetched into the Lyric Theatre."
—Robert Garland in Evening Telegram

"It is all very much worth seeing . . . A highly chuckling affair."
—Richard Lockridge in the Sun

Playgoers Versus the Box Office—In Praise Of Mr. Cohan—Audiences

The Same Old Problem.

To The Dramatic Editor:

I wish to answer Mr. L. Lawrence Weber, whose article you published on Wednesday, Dec. 4. Mr. Weber defends theatre ticket speculation by stating that playgoers prove that they desire this ticket speculation because of the fact that they patronize the ticket brokers.

This is a statement, but not a fact. I do not deny that the public patronizes the ticket brokers, but they do not do so because of choice. I happen to be one individual who enjoys the theatre, but who absolutely refuses to pay the outrageous advances demanded by ticket brokers or speculators. If one desires to see a popular show and goes to the box office, he would readily find that the only place that he can procure tickets is through the speculators. Not only is the public treated very discourteously at the box office, but they frankly tell you at these box offices that they have no tickets for weeks in advance.

If you choose from the paper a half dozen shows that you would like to see on any specific night, two or three days in advance, you soon become leg-weary walking from one theatre to another and receiving the monotonous answer that they can give you no orchestra seats two or three days in advance. I maintain that the public do not patronize the ticket brokers because they want to, but because the managers of the theatres are compelling them to by not keeping an adequate supply of tickets on hand for that portion of the public that either does not desire, or refuses, to patronize ticket brokers.

When a theatre places a price on a seat anywhere from $3.85 to $6.60, it is obtaining all that the show is worth, and why the public is compelled to pay an additional tax of anywhere from $1 to $3 a seat to a ticket broker is unknown to any one, either in or out of the theatre, except for the knowledge that the management sells out blocks of seats in advance to ticket speculators before the opening of a show, together with the fact that some time ago, upon investigation through the District Attorney's Office, it was proved that much graft exists between the box office and the speculators, thereby depriving the public of procuring tickets at box-office prices at the box office. It is very possible that the public is becoming more and more conscious of this affair and would sooner patronize a good talking picture for $2, purchasing the seats at the box office, receiving courteous treatment and good entertainment than being figuratively held up by the legitimate theatre. Mr. Pollock Leads a Cheer.

To The Dramatic Editor:

Some one . . . is it Woodward? . . . tells of the Ohio farmer who was horrified at Grant's appointment to be Commander-in-Chief. "Lead an army! My God; he comes from the same town that we do!"

Friends assure me that the comment on George Cohan's performance in "Gambling" was "very favorable." None of the "critics" seem to have said that it is a performance worthy of Lucien Guitry. Nothing seems to have disturbed our resigned habituation to the idea that today's home-made acting, though good, is pretty much just that, and no more. It would be too much to expect to find that notion dynamited by a man who used to sing through his nose, and wave the American flag, and who, undeniably, has an office, and a press agent, and comes from the same town we do.

The fact remains that, in its authority and credibility, in its spacing and pacing, its eloquent silences, its economy of effort and effectiveness of by-play, Mr. Cohan's performance is an outstanding achievement in the best traditions of France or Germany. No one who understands good acting can fail to admit it.

That is, no one whoever escapes momentarily from the rules of George Ade's I-Knew-Him-When Club. Curious hide-binding! Noel Coward is an amazing genius because he writes words and music, acts, dances and directs. He is. But so does—and is—George Cohan, in spite of the drawback that he also manages—and lives in New York!

The Upper Hand.

To The Dramatic Editor:

These times do not seem to be quite the occasion for managers and critics to spank audiences. It looks as if for some time to come the other way about would be the mode. If the theatres get any audiences this Winter they should consider themselves extremely lucky. They may even get to welcoming those who laugh at the wrong places or express their irritation at anachronisms or theme songs repeated ad infinitum. Incidentally, they may be led to come down a peg or two in their prices as there will be fewer theatregoers able to stand the strain on their pocket-books. It is no time to spank.

A certain person last Winter, wishing to treat a friend, bought two seats to "Show Boat." He paid $3.30 apiece for them with the understanding that they were in the front of the balcony, only to find, on arrival, that they were a few rows from the roof in what used to be called the family circle. As far as seeing was concerned they were worth just as much as the old-fashioned 50c apiece tickets. By the time the performance was finished the theme song had been sung in about every possible position except with the cast standing on its respective heads, so it was a great relief to escape, with the "That's why I love you, &c." impishly echoing something more á la Dorothy Parker.

Naturally, experiences like these lead straight to the movies, with their freedom to giggle at the mushy absurdities of the plot. No, the present is no time to spank audiences. It looks rather as if the playgoer was going to come into his own. Possibly he may have a bouquet or a pound of tea handed him to come out instead of sitting comfortably at home before the fire, listening to the radio's meanderings.

The Theatre Talkers.

To The Dramatic Editor:

My wife and I have have always been very fond of the theatre but, during the last year, have stayed away because of the very things you state in your article "Those Who Attend," appearing in yesterday's TIMES. I have, more than once, asked people seated behind me to keep quiet so that I could hear what the players were saying; in every instance, the ones who made the disturbance were what is generally known as the "better class."

I think there are many people staying away from the theatre the same as I. If something is not done, I am sure the theatres are going to suffer financially, and a great deal of pleasure will be taken away from those who would like to attend but who will stay away rather than put up with such rudeness and discourtesy.

It might be possible for the theatre owners to stop some of this if they would instruct the ushers to speak to the ones who talk during the performance and not make it necessary for the patron to ask for quiet. Another thing that would help would be to refuse to seat people after the curtain had gone up.

Cricket and "Journey's End."

To The Dramatic Editor:

It would be a trifle easier to sympathize with Colonel Bell's casting difficulties relative to touring companies of "Journey's End" had that gentleman and his assistant consistently "played cricket." My own experience, being typical of a number of cases, may be of some small interest. A brief recital is at least apropos, thanks to the article in last Sunday's paper.

As an American member of the group of actors "who either are or can simulate English officers and gentlemen," I sought out Colonel Bell with reference to the part of Hibbert, the emotional demands of which fall well within my acting range. He had his assistant place my name on an alleged official list and I was promised a reading when the next company should be cast. After keeping in touch for about two weeks and being repeatedly informed that I would be sent for, I learned by a casual glance at a back-stage bulletin that the company had been called about four days previously, rehearsed for two days and dismissed, without a word to me.

Please bear in mind that mine was not an isolated case.

GERMANS AND OPERETTA

Signs That Berlin Is Now Leading Vienna In This Little Matter

BERLIN, Nov. 15.

OPERETTA is not what it was. The heyday of "The Merry Widow" and the other triumphs of the Viennese school are far, far away. Vienna itself is no longer the European centre of light musical production. A Berlin school has sprung up and many of the Austrian composers have their world premières in the Prussian metropolis. And, to narrow the field still further, the Berlin operetta situation is in the hands of the Rotter brothers, who control the two leading houses devoted to this genre. They announce each new production as "under the artistic supervision of Alfred and Fritz Rotter." "Artistically" speaking, Alfred is the soul of the firm, Fritz being the astute business man. Whether the influence of the elder Rotter is for the good of the German operetta is an open question. His belief is that the German public comes to the theatre for a good cry, and the success of "Friederike," in which the audience was given an opportunity to use up three handkerchiefs a seat, encouraged him in his conviction. But in the world of the theatre there is nothing, except novelty, so dangerous as repetition. For the sake of the charm of Käthe Dorsch and the tenor tones of Richard Tauber the public accepted the tragic as entertainment. But this year the Rotters have separated their two stars and repeated the "Friederike" formula in both operettas. The rubber stamp is unmistakable to even the inhabitants of the highest heaven, so neither piece is half so successful as its prototype.

First came "Marietta," the play by Sacha Guitry for which Oscar Straus wrote some incidental music. I am told that in Paris it had a lightly satirical tone and was written for the purpose of giving Yvonne Printemps a chance to display her various amiable qualities and to furnish the author himself with an effective rôle. The German adapter, Alfred Grünwald, was ordered to make it more "human." His (and evidently Alfred Rotter's) idea of doing so was to write in an act directly cribbed from "Friederike," in which Prince Louis Napoleon's mistress, Marietta, refuses to flee with him, but insists that he stay and become emperor. This injection of self-sacrificing sentimentality is peculiarily ill-placed in the gossamer texture of the rest of the libretto. The last scene, which plays in the present day, almost eighty years later, evidently sticks closely to the original and has the superficial wit of the best boulevard tradition. In it Marietta, who is celebrating her hundredth birthday, is interviewed by a young reporter, played by the actor who impersonated the emperor in the former scenes. The sprightly, coquettish old lady gives an amusingly garbled version of the events which took place on the historic evening before the third Bonaparte accepted the emperorship.

Käthe Dorsch turned the play of her personal effervescence on the title rôle, but could do nothing with the triviality of the earlier scenes. Guitry seems to be a playwright so typically Parisian that he thins to invisibility when stretched in translation. The maudlin nobility of the renunciation scene was beyond rescue even by her emotional sincerity. But in the last scene her comedy gave the evening a high-light of humor. Michael Bohnen, whom you will remember from the Metropolitan, impersonated Prince Louis with discretion but little individuality. Unfortunately his voice is much the worse for the strenuosities of the heartless Mr. Wagner, and this is particularly noticeable in the light music which he has to sing here.

The Rotters' second production was "The Land of the Smile" ("Das Land des Lächelns"), which is merely a revision of a Lehar pre-war failure called "The Yellow Jacket." It was then admitted that the libretto was at the bottom of the thud, but I can hardly believe it was much worse than the present version by Leon, Herzer and Loehner. Here the suffering rôle in the formula is shifted from the soprano to the tenor. The daughter of a Viennese count falls in love with a Chinese diplomat, and, marrying him, follows him to his native land. There she discovers that the custom of the country forces him to marry three Chinese wives and that she is merely looked upon by the nobility as his mistress. So with the aid of a Viennese officer she attempts to make her escape. The prince discovers her plan, but magnanimously allows her to go. At the final curtain he is left concealing his broken heart behind that well-advertised Oriental smile. On the stage this is not quite as ridiculous as it sounds; it is merely dull. Hardly a moment of humor is allowed to filter through, and the tragic last act is so much emotional soap bubble. Only a very exceptional actress like Käthe Dorsch can make pathos touch us in an operetta; just fancy the madness of demanding it from a tenor.

But in Berlin Richard Tauber makes up for much by his singing. I am not taken by his rather ponderous attempts at matinee idol mannerisms. But his voice and the way in which he uses it stand outside the realm of criticism. I certainly know no tenor, and I include the best Italian voices, who has such a complete range from pianissimo and mezza-voce to the trumpet of the fortissimo. And Tauber is a musician to his finger-tips, creating art out of the most trivial of melodies.

The two scores, by Oscar Straus and Lehar, are interesting as contrasts. Straus keeps his orchestra transparent and always with the suggestion of chamber-music about it, while Lehar uses all the resources of opera with Verdi and Puccini never far away. Personally, I prefer the Straus type of score, with its delicate appeal to good taste; I find Lehar's melodies too heavily orchestrated for their content. But here there is no choice, for Lehar has had his usual quota of melodic ideas and Straus has merely discreetly said nothing at all. Outside of an amusing little fox-trot in the last act, Marietta has not a singable hit, while the first act of "The Land of the Smile" is studded with delightful solos and duets. Lehar, with a good libretto, is still one of the strongest figures in the international musical comedy world.

A TOLSTOY PLAY RETURNS

ON Nov. 8, 1910, Lyov Nikolayevich Tolstoy died after having maintained for over thirty years that there should be no copyright or exclusive printing privileges of any of his work. He had been steadily frustrated in this ideal by an aristocratic wife of the old régime, and it was natural that he should leave countless manuscripts with whose publication he had refused to be concerned. Among these voluminous papers was "The Living Corpse" sprawling and uncoordinated and unfinished. The version presented by the Civic Repertory Theatre on Friday evening was prepared by Jacob Ben-Ami, who also plays the title rôle in it.

But the American stage has sheltered this play before, at four different periods, never in the same version and never with the same animating idea. On Nov. 3 of the year directly following Tolstoy's death, the old Thalia Theatre in the Bowery flaunted a legend in large Yiddish letters to the effect that a posthumous play by one of the great Russian masters was to be shown that evening for the first time anywhere. This statement erred slightly on the side of enthusiasm; two months before, in a production of typical brilliant realism, Stanislavsky had presented it at the Moscow Art Theatre simultaneously with another production in Moscow and one in St. Petersburg.

Functioning at the Thalia Theatre were Jacob Adler, the famous tragedian, and his repertory company. This was the first presentation of "The Living Corpse" outside of Russia. In the inevitable manner, this version was not a direct one, but an adaptation by Leon Kobrin. Performing with Slavic intensity were, among others, Sarah Adler and Mme. Epstein, and there were six acts and twelve scenes, just as when the Moscow Art Theatre had played it. What served somewhat to take the edge off the Adler production was the fact that other plays in his répertoire, alternating through each week, were "The Song of Love," "Girl of the Golden West" and "Bought and Paid For." But "The Living Corpse" proved just as successful as these frankly theatrical exhibits: it lingered for four months, and Jacob Adler played Fedya over 150 times.

Five years later, after the play had been shown in every capital of Europe (with the exception of Paris, where a printed translation sold extraordinarily well), the German repertory group at our own Irving Place Theatre decided to present it for a week. Rudolph Christians was the guiding genius of the group. Feeling, along with every one else, that the incomplete state in which the drama had been left by Tolstoy was an encouragement in itself to rearrangement, Christians converted it into a three-act play with only eleven scenes instead of the accepted twelve. To facilitate the necessarily rapid changes, he made use of the inner stage, setting alternate episodes both on that (in front of a black drop) and on the forestage. Oct. 18, 1916, was the date of his première.

But Reinhardt's production of 1912, involving such aids as Moissi and a revolving stage, lingered too well in the minds of those who knew the play. H. T. Parker, writing in The Boston Transcript on Christians, was inclined to little applause: "Everything seemed wrong. The 'inner' stage was too far back for intimate effect; its height made the picture grotesque. Bad taste dis-date of this première.

The best known of the American productions came in October of 1918, when Arthur Hopkins offered a version called "Redemption." Mr. Hopkins had been preparing this in his mind for many years—ever since, in fact, he had written an article for the September, 1913, issue of Harper's Bazaar, called "Brain Plays of Germany," and had gone into considerable rapture about Reinhardt's production of "The Living Corpse," the play itself and Moissi's performance. Two scenes of the drama were now eliminated; it was frankly an American adaptation and took acknowledged liberties.

Remembering the revolving stage he had seen in Berlin, Mr. Hopkins conferred with Robert Edmond Jones to produce the equivalent. The result was a concentration on the centre of the stage and the foreground, just as Christians had done two years before. But this time the treatment was successful. It may be suspected that the presence of John Barrymore as Fedya largely contributed to the drama's striking effect.

For ten years there was a lapse; then, last year a production came which was no American showing at all, but which was undoubtedly the most important one exhibited here at any time, since it featured the same actor, Moissi, who had originally played it in 1912, and was prepared by the same Reinhardt who had inspired both Rudolph Christians and Arthur Hopkins to the presentations they offered several years later.

ALL ABOUT HUGH STANISLAUS STANGE

IT were trifling with heredity (though playwrights admittedly do) that Hugh Stanislaus Stange should have given his attention to any profession save the theatre, and when he enlisted in the army that went to the Mexican border in 1916 you could see from here to the Rio Grande that it was a big mistake.

The most elemental mathematics cite that event as having taken place thirteen years ago, and at this distance there is every reason to believe that Mr. Stange at the time was suffering an acute reaction against the stage and particularly as it concerned his own acting on it. Though he might have been lured toward the playhouse by his father's (Stanislaus Stange) eminence as the author of "The Chocolate Soldier," "Pif, Paf, Poof," "The Girl in the Taxi" and kindred undertakings, any enthusiasm evoked by this parental glamour was neatly counterbalanced.

Perhaps it is a family fable, but the elder Stange, seeing his son in a New York military academy, viewed this as a laggard tendency in a young man, and forthwith put an end to it. A far, far better thing, he called it, to lay down one's life in the trenches and dug-outs of a rancid Broadway than to waste it in the sham battles of a toy parade ground. He put his son upon the stage, but not the Broadway stage. It was that before-the-war circuit over which Mr. Woods could still profitably send a ninth company of "Within the Law," and in that company was the younger Stange, impersonating English Eddie Griggs. It was also the sort of company in which the leading lady and the master carpenter were considered about equally important—viz., $35 a week, and if you don't like it, who do you think you are, a Barrymore? Mr. Stange appeared in "Potash and Perlmutter" and "The Yellow Ticket" under much the same conditions, but it was all a little discouraging, and when Villa became a menace to the Southwest he leaped at a chance to subdue him. If, not living in Dallas, Texas, or Medford, Ore., you missed seeing him then, it was your own bad luck. Or not so bad, perhaps.

At any rate, Mr. Stange's profession has, since then, been that of a playwright, beginning when he and Stannard Mears dramatized Booth Tarkington's "Seventeen." The fact that this estimable piece was on its way from Indianapolis to the Booth Theatre as a Stuart Walker production when the great war interrupted his career makes answer to those who believe that he has only recently become a playwright—with "Fogbound," say, or "Tin Pan Alley."

Probably there are still men and women living who, on the night of Sept. 30, 1920, crept out of the Lexington Theatre and into the night after having seen "The Dawn of Ireland," by Hugh Stange. Mr. Stange still joins in their polite agony at the memory of his hero, a young Irishman who uttered blasphemies in the face of the King's representatives, and was roundly applauded for it. But even the theatre's illusion (and windows painted on canvas drops were part of it) could not hide the fact that the applause was confined entirely to the stage. . . . When this incident was concluded, as it very shortly was, and time had washed away its patriotic rhetoric, a playwright was still struggling to revive his career.

The latter has been a leisurely process, touched with intermittent failures about which Mr. Stange, like any one subject to the hardening influences of commerce, is not too evasive. He wrote "Wings of Chance" in three weeks, sold it in two days, and saw it closed on the road before it could get into New York. Similarly, "Glamour" was taken off for a revision that turned out instead to be a quiet burial, piously conducted by A. H. Woods, Al Lewis and Sam Harris. It was not until "Fogbound" was produced at the Belmont Theatre on April 1, 1927, that Mr. Stange was actually represented on Broadway; and "Fogbound," with Nance O'Neil as an 18-year-old girl throughout the first act, lasted twenty-seven performances. Then Mr. Stange wrote "Veneer."

"Veneer," which departed from the town only last night, arrived on Broadway after languishing in the offices of Harry Cort, Paul Streger and then Mr. Cort again (and, incidentally, netting three sets of advance royalties, which is the least an inactive play can decently do). Between this play's writing and its arrival, "Tin Pan Alley" came and went. . . . It wasn't so good, Mr. Stange agrees, though he is still inclined to hold out for its first act. It was when the last two acts of "Tin Pan Alley" went away, of necessity taking the first one with them, that he polished off "Veneer," wrote the recently arrived "Headquarters," and lately finished what will be an Easter present to himself, a comedy identified at the moment as "The Eve of St. Agnes." Mr. Golden, too, has—or soon will have—a Stange drama entitled "After Tomorrow."

Casual readers of the foregoing account are at liberty to gather that its hero's revolt was after all only temporary, and that he was but indulging in boyish sport when he went away to fight Mexicans and Germans. If it had not been for the war, you will say. . . . But Mr. Stange regards the Broadway battle as an equally interesting one, full of plays and people who, as they are about to die, at least salute you.

WAY DOWN EAST

BOSTON, Dec. 4.

EVEN as early as this, Boston seems to be feeling the pre-Christmas slump in its theatrical business. "Woof, Woof," which may serve as an example, opened a week ago Monday at the Majestic and did a fine business for the first week, but during the last few days receipts have fallen off. This musical, by the way, is being revised in book and cast, and soon will be ready for a New York showing.

In case some local theatregoers had not heard echoes of its success during the past year or so in New York, Boston reviewers waxed enthusiastic over the antics of Eddie Cantor and the general splendor of "Whoopee." Business at the Colonial, as at other houses, is not by any means capacity. The orchestra sale is very good, but in the balcony it is a little slow so far. Possibly some people are confused by the fact that Mr. Cantor is appearing in a talking picture at a downtown movie house at the same time, and this in spite of the fact that the "Whoopee" ads stress fervently the fact that the production is not "canned."

"Journey's End" continues at an even pace of satisfactory business with no closing date announced at this writing. While it looked at one time as if Billie Burke would come into the Plymouth with her new show, these plans have been changed and the house has nothing in prospect. . . . "Strike Up the Band," presumably in a new and complete form, will open a two weeks' engagement at the Shubert on Dec. 23. Clark and McCullough are the names in the production, and the music, in case any one has forgotten, is Gershwin's.

At the Hollis Street Theatre, last Monday, the New York Theatre Guild opened a two weeks' engagement of "Meteor." Boston critics seem to feel that there is material here that needs much revision, but that, on the whole, an entertaining piece has been evolved. Broadway will probably see this in two weeks. Continuing at the Hollis for six weeks, the Guild Acting Company will present "Wings Over Europe," "Major Barbara" and "Pygmalion."

The eighteenth annual appeal for the Hundred Neediest Cases is made today.

SOME MILLIONS OF GAULS GO MUSICAL

Geddes or Woolley or Ceballos. When five carloads of properties and trappings and scenery and electrical displays were crammed on to the stage of the Colonial Theatre, adjoining the peaceful Common, what is often known as pandemonium reigned. And it continued reigning until 8:30 Thursday night.

No one in all that company, not even the producer and his aides, had so much as set eye on any item of the scenery until Sunday night in Boston. Of course they knew just what it was, because it had been carefully plotted and contrived with photographic accuracy, but manipulating it for the first time was something that tested the patience of the producer and the muscles of the stage hands. For three days and nights—stage hands can be produced who will swear before a notary that they did not leave the theatre for seventy-two hours—the mechanics alternately tussled and cajoled and pleaded with the sets. Not until they could be frisked about with something akin to abandonment could anything like a dress rehearsal be attempted, and before a dress rehearsal could be essayed there must be rehearsals. In the interest of accuracy it is here set down that the scenery eventually was in its place at 10 o'clock on Tuesday of that memorable week, and that Wednesday afternoon Mr. Geddes marshaled his men and in five hours synchronized the scenery with the lights and properties. On Wednesday evening came the first dress rehearsal, and it lasted until 7 o'clock on Thursday morning. The company was dismissed from 7 until 11, when rehearsals were resumed to continue literally until the rise of the curtain on the opening performance. Food was sent in from outside the theatre.

That this numerous company did so familiarize themselves is evident from the accurate observation that the first curtain in Boston ascended at 8:30 o'clock and its final one descended at 11:45, without so much as a fouled drop or a vagrant sandbag or a blown-out fuse or a missed cue to mar the exercises.

"Fifty Million Frenchmen" cost its producers—in numbers that are religiously modest rather than brusquely rough—a quarter of a million of dollars. Now that it is set up in shining estate on West Forty-second Street, where it was widely cheered on its opening night and is catalogued in even the more discriminating indices as a hit, it can bring in a gross revenue to its sponsors of some $45,000 a week, with a week based on eight performances. With capacity trade, it can profit to the extent of $15,000 a week.

The fidelity exercised in the construction and direction of "Fifty Million Frenchmen" is best testified by its smaller nuances. It is obvious to the tourist that the sets have followed out the scenes which they represent in great detail, but who recognizes in the gentleman who plays the bartender at the Ritz in the prologue a duplicate of the famous Frank who presides over that oasis in reality? And who recognizes that the bellboys at the Ritz, the chasseurs from Maxim's, the bus boys and the waiters are authentic in costume and braid and gold down to the last burnished button?

In only one respect did Chevalier Goetz fail in his quest for authenticity. He cabled his friend, Billy Dodsworth, manager of the American Express Company in Paris, asking him to get in touch with Zelli, The Zelli, and make him an offer to appear in person in the scene where his own restaurant is flung across the stage. Dodsworth approached Zelli, and that worthy promptly cabled Mr. Goetz: "Sailing Jan. 6; postpone opening." After Boston even a Zelli couldn't involve Mr. Goetz in another delay, and thus the show, "Fifty Million Frenchmen," sprawls brilliantly on Forty-second Street Zelli-less.

GERMANY'S TALKING FILMS

Importance of Dialogue Is Realized and Shown in Studio Expansion

By FLOYD GIBSON.

BERLIN.

THAT Germany has awakened to the necessity of producing talking films is shown by the opening, late in October, of the great new sound-proof studio at Neubabelsberg. It will be recalled that for many months the producing companies here were undecided upon the wisdom of Hollywood's decision in favor of the talking film; the publicity which this decision received, which German companies might well have utilized to their benefit, met with no response except the halting of schedules for silent film production and the increasing of legal battles over patent right. The public, with its natural interest in the new medium, was left unsupplied; no American talking films (with the exceptions of "The Singing Fool" and "Submarine") were introduced, and there were no German talking films because none of the producers had yet made up their minds that the expensive new medium would provide a good investment for the large sums of money which tonfilm (as it is here called) production would require.

It was in April or thereabout that the Universum Film A. G., better known in America as "UFA," decided that the Rubicon must be crossed after all, an began work on the giant new atelier, which has now been in use less than a month. Cruciform in design, with a small court in the centre, the entire structure contains four stages, the north and south ones being 20 by 30 meters large, the east and west 18 by 25 meters. The appearance of the whole building, which is windowless and built of dark brick, given a distinctly Egyptian impression, long, low, massive, secretive. The walls are double, with two feet or so of air between, to provide the necessary insulation against outside noises; doors are heavy structures of steel buttressed by rubber; for the lighting of the stage only huge incandescent bulbs are used, for with arcs there is a constant danger of a loud whishing noise; in all the usual respects as regards dressing rooms, lighting controls, general convenience of arrangement, it is the very latest word in German design—which is to say, ultra-modern. The interiors are painted, for example, with light reds, yellows, blues; the inside walls of the stages are lined with sound-absorbent materials. But in regard to the facilities for tone recording, the UFA—entering the field relatively late—has carefully studied American methods, and for this reason it will not be surprising if the products of this new atelier, in excellence, will entirely escape the many pitfalls and technical difficulties into which the first American offerings found they had fallen. Not only will they not convey a feeling of inexperienced methods; they will equal the contemporary American product which Hollywood is now turning out so fast. The writer has seen—and heard—parts of films now being produced, with the result that his critical enthusiasm has been aroused.

Film in Two Languages.

Every tonfilm made in Germany is, must, also be made in English; the cost of production is too high, and the German market too small, to admit of its being otherwise. The films which are now being turned at Neubabelsberg (two are nearly completed, while four more are well under way) should, by next May or June, reach the United States. The attractions of such films, for those millions who are financially prohibited from traveling, and who form the great part of the moviegoing public, is obvious. One film, for example, "The Beloved Vagabond," is laid in the Austrian Tyrol; for six weeks a large company was on location in Lienz, not far from the Italian border—a small town nestling among the Tyrolian Alps. Here with a portable recording apparatus installed in a specially constructed truck, weer photographed, as a background for the picture, scenes from the life of the peasants. A small village was found which provided the locale for the story; dances, feast days, a cattle show were all provided on the spot. Because it was actually photographed where the story is laid, it will inevitably provide the completed picture with an authenticity which its superb photography will bring to hundreds of screens, many of them thousands of miles away. One spends an evening in Tyrol for 50 cents! The attraction is patently striking.

Recording Methods.

The methods of recording are, as already pointed out, very similar in principle to those prevailing in Hollywood. The camera, and the tone camera in the recording room, are driven synchronously by like motors, thus insuring that both films are exposed at precisely the same rate of speed. Control is secured by a system not unlike a ship's telegraph. Dials with pointers—a dial at each end with segments in which various instructions, such as "Test," "Action," "New camera position," "Pause" and the like, are written—provide the means, supplemented by a telephone, whereby the recording room and the camera on the studio floor can remain in accord. A point for synchronization is secured by clapping a pair of sticks together at the focal point in front of the camera, thus providing a "Clack!" on the toneband, and a point of coming-together on the regular film, which later can be superimposed to insure that the sound will coordinate with movements on the screen. As through a funnel, all sound and all controls pass through the "listening-in room," a sound-proof room placed behind a great window overlooking the interior of the stage. Here sits the sound director, who, understanding the various distances involved in the scene, lessens or increases the volume of sound which flows from the microphone to the amplifiers, in accordance with the laws of nature and the dictates of the action. Although the recording rooms are equipped with both disk and film methods of recording, up to the present the film method, which depends upon the Kerr cell for its operation, has been used exclusively.

The Kerr Cell.

Klangfilm G. M. B. H., a subsidiary of Siemens Halske, is working with UFA, and is responsible for the installation and operation of the sound apparatus and recording. The Kerr cell, by which the electrical energy takes optical form, is composed of two brass electrodes a very small distance apart, immersed in a solution of nitro-benzol; in direct line with this opening, one on each side of the cell, are two so-called Nichol prisms, retangular masses of crystal which have been sliced diagonally and then cemented together with Canada balsam, the slants of the two prisms arranged in opposing directions; beyond these two prisms are objective lens, behind one of which is a constantly burning light, and behind the other the transient strip of film. The lines from the amplifier, carrying in electrical form the properly modulated acoustical energy delivered to the microphone, are attached to the two electrodes, passing from one to the other through the solution of nitro-benzol. It is the peculiar property of the whole apparatus that the bar of light passing through the objective lens, the up-slanting prism, the nitro-benzol, the space between the electrodes, more nitro-benzol, the down-slanting prism, the second objective lens onto the film is made thicked or thinner in proportion to the electrical energy which passes between the electrodes. The actual recording apparatus is a wealth of mechanical finesse and compensation, but this is briefly the method which has made the whole swing-over to the talking films feasible in Germany.

With the Germans' love for and command over technical matters, and the infinite attention to detail which distinguishes them in the mechanical world, it would be surprising if Germany had passed up the possibilities afforded by the production of talking films. The vistas, the technical potentialities involved, bring joy to the German soul. With the equipment now available at Neubabelsberg, and with the best directors and technical assistants already at work, it will not be long before Germany is once more demonstrating to the world its superiority in a matter demanding meticulous and constant technical application.

IN JAPAN

ACCORDING to The London Times, within the last year or so the cinema in Japan has become extremely popular, and there is now a determined effort on the part of the Japanese film companies to keep pace with the expanding market and to establish the industry on a firm basis.

"In 1928," the article says, "the aggregate attendance at the pictures amounted to more than 136,000,000 people. Some idea of the progress made in the production of films in Japan can be gathered from the fact that of the total shown the proportion of Japanese films has risen from 10 to 85 per cent during the last six years.

"In an informative review of the position of foreign films in Japan, issued by the Department of Overseas Trade, it is pointed out, however, that of the foreign films at present shown 70 per cent are American, 20 per cent German, 5 per cent French and Italian, and 5 per cent British.

CAST BACK FROM AFRICA

"Trader Horn" Troupe Returns Travel Weary From the Dark Continent

RED-FACED and travel-weary but in good spirts, a few of the troupe of players that went to Africa to film "Trader Horn" straggled into the Hotel Warwick last Tuesday, threw themselves into convenient easy chairs and recited some of their Congo experiences.

Zambesi Jack couldn't come. After flipping a coin with Little Peru for the rights to Nina T, Peru had won and taken the girl, whom they had found as a white goddess in a joss-house, away with him. But there was no ending to this story. Duncan Renaldo, who impersonated Little Peru in the film, was with Edwina Booth, who plays Nina T. Harry Carey, who is to be seen as Trader Horn, was not present. It was as if Trader Horn's fictional tale was working itself out.

Renaldo, a handsome Latin type, one of the two screen brothers in "The Bridge of San Louis Rey," was eager to retail his African adventures. And Miss Booth, too, a tall, lovely blonde, unburned by the African sun, lay back in her chair and speculated on a return to the veldt within a few years.

"I shot a lion!" Miss Booth exclaimed.

"Yes, she did," Renaldo corroborated.

"I thought I killed him," she continued, "but he jumped up and hopped about a bit. I thought it was a show. Then he came toward me and I had already dropped my gun. One of the boys had to shoot him all over again. But he was my kill. I have pictures of him to prove it."

It was rather hard to believe that this dainty girl had just arrived from the midst of cannibal country, poison arrows, rhinos and hippos, lions and elephants, and had hunted lions, shot one, proud of her kill and showed pictures of it. She was more believably the mythological princess she played in "Manhattan Cocktail." It was easier to think of her as the girl who six months ago, as the company sailed for the Dark Continent, talked of the gowns she would buy in Paris and the number of jars of cold cream necessary in a tropical climate.

"But we did go to Paris," she said, "even if only for three hours. And while I wanted to see what makes the Parisians chic, somebody dragged me to a tomb. Of all things, a tomb, and then the Eiffel Tower in Paris!"

Almost every member of the company was at one time or another taken down with fever. There was much quinine dosing and many rain washouts, and when camp was pitched alongside the Nile the crocodiles crept up at night out of the black waters and snapped their jaws at the tarpaulins.

Not All Returned Yet.

The group is yet not fully returned. W. S. Van Dyke, the director, who made jaunts to the South Seas and other equatorial spots to film pictures, is still aboard ship on his way home and two camera and sound-recording men are now in Africa cutting up game, tying it to the limbs of trees in which microphones have been installed, and waiting to record the roar of a lion or the various noises of the jungle at night.

They all, at any rate, considered it a grand adventure. W. B. Riley and Albert Arnold, the handy men that Mr. Van Dyke took with him from Hollywood, were of the opinion that everything they did could have been done with ease in Hollywood.

"Everything, that is," Arnold interrupted, "but the clouds. There aren't any clouds any place in the world like down there."

Al Mesch, the assistant sound man, who was sent to Mombasa for three months to record the noises of the jungle, thought the same.

"And there were other things that happened that might never have occurred in Hollywood," he added. "For example, the time three of us were sent with a sound truck over the hilly trails to record some sequences a day's march ahead of the company. We had food for a single day. But it took us more than two to make the trip with tire trouble and rough going, and we had to sleep in the open under 'tarps,' with the animals howling around us and a fire our only means of keeping the beasts off."

This reminded Riley of a similar occasion when he and another man had been ferried across Lake Victoria to make an advance camp, and when they were transported to the other side they were forgotten and forced to live from Tuesday to Sunday on canned peaches.

The technical men were kept busy. They constructed a deserted village in the middle of the river. They built a great forty-foot joss-house in which interiors could be "shot," they blasted rock to make roads and built bridges and tunnels. The grand safari was a magnificent sight, they all agreed. Sometimes there were forty trucks carrying the company over the country, traveling like a circus with the conveniences of a moving city.

The participants were full of stories. Some concerned Mr. Van Dyke's adventure with a huge buffalo that was ready to charge on the company. Others told of the prowess of the native boys and how they were able to cook a seven-course dinner in an empty gasoline can outdoors on a rainy day.

The boys formed a very close attachment for their masters, too. Each white man had a servant who made his bed, washed the clothes and cooked his meals, besides being his chief guide and carrier through the jungles. When the group left, Renaldo said his boy attendant wept and asked him to come back to Africa some day.

Renaldo was made a blood brother of one of the tribes. This young actor, who is conversant with several languages, picked up a bit of Swahili while in the country and became fast friends with a number of the kings and chiefs.

Have Had Little News.

The group had been out of touch with newspapers and motion picture news all the time they were in Africa. Their work had demanded so much of them they did not even have time to read a motion-picture magazine, according to Miss Booth. It was a surprise to them to hear that film companies in Hollywood were making audible films in more than one language. This especially delighted Renaldo who uttered a few words in Swahili and asserted he would make one in that language.

In Mombasa, the port on the coast at which all steamers dock for the game country, the company attended a motion picture performance. Miss Booth said it was something with Constance Talmadge and about ten years old. When the Americans saw the ancient technique and the heavy dramatics being portrayed they burst into laughter much to the surprise of the other patrons of the theatre.

After the performance they sought out the manager and asked him why he exhibited such old films. He told them that that section of the country was just about ten years behind in pictures and that if he did install sound in his theatre, as he contemplated at the time, it would probably create a revolutionary stir along the whole of the East Coast, so novel would it seem to the populace who are only now becoming acquainted with William Farnum and Douglas Fairbanks.

The little group was loaded down with souvenirs. The men wore bracelets made of the wire-like hair taken from an elephant's tail. They brought in ivory and articles made of the various animals' hides. Arnold, the constructor, brought back the whole of a hippo's jaw in which he plans to build a dinner gong or else make a picture frame of it. The men said they would buy ivory cigarette holders in Woolworths and represent them as coming from Africa, because of the high and almost prohibitive prices asked for them there.

The film is approximately two-thirds completed. Most of the dialogue sequences are yet to be made in California and some of the scenes that were not successfully completed will be retaken in domestic surroundings. Certain episodes with crocodiles which were impossible because the "crocs" insisted on swinging their tales and snapping their cavernous jaws at people, will be remade in Hollywood. The story was only slightly changed, not enough it was said, to make any difference in the final pictorial result. The completed picture may be prefaced by a talkie from old Aloysfus Horn, taken when he was in California.

THE USE OF DOUBLES.

WHILE doubles are rare in talking pictures there still remains a supernumerary who is important in the filming of a photoplay; he is the stand-in. He or she represents the star, not in acting, but simply by standing on the set while a scene is being prepared. He or she is made up to represent the star as closely as possible, and while the principal player is resting between scenes or rehearsing and another sequence is being prepared the stand-in poses before the camera until the focus has been adjusted and the lights and composition arranged to obtain an ideal arrangement.

AN ARISTOTELIAN VIEW

Grand Old Greek Would Relish Crook Films, Says Simile Collector

By FRANK J. WILSTARCH.

THE late James Huneker once said that the critic was an emetic for the health of the actor, and if we are to accept the dictum of our schoolboy friend, Aristotle—reputed inventor of the blessed dramatic unities—the underworld photoplay should serve as a mental laxative for the criminally inclined.

This Aristotelian idea will come as a blow—or rather as the boy in the street would say, a jolt—to the atrabilious nincompoop who holds doggedly to the opinion that there cannot, of necessity, be anything good and worth while in that which is popular with the general public.

It is a strange and curious thing that two thousand or more years ago a like condition of affairs should have existed. The Greek tragedies were, after a fashion, similar to our crook or underworld pictures. They both are exciting. But the tragedies proving popular, a violent protest was at once set up by the ninyhammers.

This brought Grecce's grand old boy Aristotle hot-foot into the Lyceum. He told the dunderpated donkeys to lay off; that there was nothing wrong about displaying these thumping dramas to the public gaze; that merely because they were popular didn't prove that they were inimical to the public good; that, in point of fact, they actually purged the soul of sordid and base ideas and desires, and so served as a moral cathartic.

This, then, is the Aristotelian theory of catharsis, otherwise mental purification. He went so far as to declare the purification to be the chief function of art; that emotions accumulated in us under the pressure of social restraints, and liable to sudden issue in unsocial and destructive action; thus these potential rebellions against right doing are sluiced away in a harmless form of theatrical excitement.

If Aristotle Returned.

Should old Aristotle revisit the glimpses of the moon, on Broadway one of these nights, and drop in on one of our popular underworld photoplays, it is easy to understand the spiritual elation he would get out of it! And if this delectable old boy, who was a pupil of Plato, and himself a teacher of Alexander the Great, chanced to eye or hear the silly, inane and puerile lamentations that have been made in opposition to this type of picture, it is pretty certain that he would be thoroughly flabbergasted. Instead of Catharsis, old Aristotle would, no doubt, under the circumstances, recommend entanasia.

Should it be explained to him that a certain crook picture had been denied presentation in Chicago; in fact, that this Western city, fearful of the evil effects on the public, had banned all such pictures, it would undoubtedly cause the Old Boy to burst the girdle of his tunic with laughter. He would say that there wasn't anything funnier in the comedies of Aristophanes, who was busy making 'em laugh twenty-three hundred or more years ago in Aristotle's home town. And having seen the whole round of so-called crook, underworld or detective story pictures—and discovered that, invariably, the criminal was brought to book in the end—he would stamp his sandaled feet and cry: "Well, the supply of agonizing fusspots has not lessened; they were quite as active in my day as now, ever whining and snorting about whatever proved a source of pleasure to the populace."

Old Aristotle, now thoroughly aroused, would, undoubtedly, remark: "How does it come, if the reading of detective stories tends to exert evil influences on their readers, that very many of the most distinguished people of the world haven't turned crooks? One of the most prominent detective story fans is none other than your Ambassador to Mexico, Dwight Morrow. Nothing has been heard, so far as I know, of Ambassador Morrow turning outlaw, robbing banks or committing cumulative or Babylonian whoopee. And when Secretary of State Kellogg went abroad, in his effort to outlaw war, he carried along with him, I understand, an ample supply of detective stories. King George of England is another detective story reader; so, also, Bernard Shaw, former Premier Baldwin, Lloyd George, President Hoover and very many of the most important people of the world. The silly protesters very likely are themselves readers of crook, detective and murder mystery stories, as well as patrons of photoplays of like character; but finding the public enjoys this sort of thing, are fearful of the evil the masses might suffer. By the way, have you ever found out who the thunder, lightning and hurricanes compose the masses? We old Greeks could never locate this mysterious type. Everybody is always talking about the masses; but nobody belongs to it.

A Bavarian's Ideas.

"I find there was a fellow about here lately," old Aristotle would continue, "who is much after my kidney—none other than Dr. Frank Koelsch, State Counselor and Industrial Physician of the Bavarian Government. It is very significant what this distinguished doctor had to say:

"'I have spoken,' said he, 'of the industrial value of the motion picture as a health asset, because that is my particular field of study, but I am equally convinced that to the family, in every walk of life, the motion picture is one of the great gifts of the age. We find in Germany that the increasing popularity of motion pictures leads more and more to the whole family taking its recreation as a unit. That is great progress from the sociological standpoint. The corner poolroom and the questionable resort will become less and less the magnet of the workingman as motion pictures continue to improve and increase their hold on the public imagination. In Germany, tests which we have made of the psychological effect of American motion pictures brought us to the conclusion that the inevitability of punishment, as portrayed in plots under the safeguards voluntarily adopted in the United States, tend to make the screen a very positive deterrent from crime.'

"By a curious twist," would remark the clear-thinking, peripatetic Old Boy of Athens, "we here discover—that while the delights and advantages of so amazing an invention as the photoplay, brought into so fine a flower in this country, is appreciated at its full worth in far-off Bavaria—a parcel of yahoos here at home would belittle its merit and, did they have their way, would destroy it with dumbness.

"The great trouble," continued the tunicked shade, "with your crook and detective photoplay, is this: it is not so much that they make crime abhorrent, but that they are exciting and engrossing, instead of being dull and fatiguing. Their popularity is certain to excite the antipathy of the weasel-minded meddler. Times have not changed. It was the same with the doddering donkeys of my day. They blamed the glorious comedies and tragedies performed at Athens for all the follies of the time. I had hoped that when I took a look in on you that human nature had progressed sufficiently to pounce down upon and destroy the insufferable crape-hanger. But here he is, just as he was with us, 2,200 years ago."

"TAMING OF THE SHREW"

Mr. Fairbanks and Miss Pickford in Talking Film of Shakespeare's Farce

By MORDAUNT HALL.

WHATEVER may be thought of the doings in the Fairbanks-Pickford talking pictorial version of "The Taming of the Shrew," there is no doubt concerning its excellent entertainment value. As it is none too long, which in itself is a compliment to a film, it does seem a pity that the wagering of the husbands as to the obedience of their respective wives was not included in this frolicsome production, which, it might be said, is not improved by a close-up of Mary Pickford, as Katherina, winking while making her last exhortation to wives. This is hardly necessary, especially considering the tone of her voice and her demeanor.

Throughout, except for the inclusion of a few words of a marriage ceremony, the lines are those of Shakespeare. Mr. Fairbanks, who gives a capital interpretation of Petruchio, sometimes laughs a little too long and too loudly, an error that has been made also in certain stage productions of the Bard's farce.

It is a beautifully mounted film, in which the supporting cast help out in the merriment. Whether or no the off-stage actions attributed to Miss Pickford are a little too wild for Katherina, she is appealing, and when occasion demands she sacrifices dignity for a laugh. Concerning her physical appearance, who is to know but that she is quite an acceptable woman for the rôle? She may not be Amazonian, but many a small woman has bossed a giant husband. And in the course of those scenes where it is demanded she put fire into her display of wrath, or of shrewishness, she succeeds without a doubt. Garbed in a long velvet gown, she is by no means disappointing in the introductory scenes, although she scarcely looks equal to the mad actions that precede her appearance. After she has been subjected to the ignominy of the horseback ride from Padua to Verona on Petruchio's queer, broad-backed horse, with the comic fetlocks, she actually shows the effects of the rain and the journey.

She elicits sympathy when she stands shivering by a window while the table is spread with viands and fruit, undecided whether to stay or leave the confident Petruchio—hungry and wet, but still unconquered. It is the belief of Petruchio's comrades that he will be "Kated." But while Petruchio does not come off as triumphant as he does in the play, he at least can be said to a certain extent to have tamed Kate ere the curtain falls on their escapades.

One of the funniest sequences in this film is that dealing with the wedding. All are waiting for Petruchio, Katherina in her bridal gown, the priest ready to read the ceremony and Kate's timid father, Baptista, evidently fearful that his shrewish offspring is to be left at the altar and therefore apt to be wilder than ever. Eventually word comes that Petruchio is arriving in his queer garb and on his queerer steed. He is preceded by his servant, the alarmed Grumio, who knows not what to make of the idea of his master marrying the obstreperous Kate. Then Petruchio puts in his appearance, but he does not hurry to genuflect before the priest. He gives a cheery wave of the hand to his bride-to-be and continues munching an apple, as he leans against a wall. It is the second lesson for Katherina, who finds humiliation decidedly distasteful. Having bided his own good time, the agile Petruchio then deigns to come to Katherina's side, and once the ceremony is over the angry Kate thinks that she will stay at least a while in her father's house. Petruchio wills otherwise, and when Kate thinks that she will resist him she is suddenly lifted off her feet and in no time finds herself on the shoulder of her husband, who, with marked agility, vaults to the saddle of his comic horse.

Another interlude that provokes no end of laughter is that in which Kate tries to outwit Petruchio in his curriculum of taming her. He has not counted (in the picture) on Katherina overhearing him deliver his speech on how he, after sending her to bed famished, has decided to keep her awake. This harangue is spoken by Petruchio to his Great Dane, which barks approval. Petruchio goes upstairs, bangs doors, throws a chair across the room, but Kate remains with her eyes closed, which is somewhat mystifying to Petruchio. He then flings open the window, permitting a healthy breeze to sweep the apartment. Katherina leaps out of bed and, instead of closing the window, as her husband anticipates, unfastens another. Petruchio, carrying out his program, tosses the bolster from the bed and Kate goes him one better by pulling off the coverlet and bedclothes. Petruchio flings off the mattress and during a moment's respite from the furious antics Kate lies down comfortably on the bedclothes in a corner of the room, with her head on a pillow propped against the wall. Petruchio soon pulls away the pillow, with the result that Kate's pate comes into abrupt contact with the wall.

All this, as well as other hilarious incidents, have aroused many a wave of laughter in the Rivoli Theatre, and when things calm down and Kate delivers her talk to other wives Miss Pickford's wink can be understood as a concession to her female public, for no matter what Shakespeare wrote or what may happen on the stage the woman in the case, if impersonated by beauty, must never be actually docile. Hence, it is merely Kate telling the spectators that she is consenting to this and that because it makes for happiness, and that in the end Petruchio will find himself tamed, for she, Katherina Pickford, in this age of women voters, women lawyers, women in Congress and women as presidents of business concerns, will never on the screen permit her sex to be triumphed over by mere man, not even to please the Bard of Avon and the frowning bald-headed sticklers for the letter of his writings.

Millions who may not have seen one of Shakespeare's plays will now be able to listen to his words, even though the action is more than slightly changed.

Prince John.

JOHN BARRYMORE'S shadow came to town at Warners' Theatre and talked in his first feature-length production, which is called "General Crack." This film reveals Mr. Barrymore in a far better light than most of his recent silent pictures, although his performances in "Beau Brummel," "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde," "The Tempest" and a few other pictorial adventures were the film high-lights of their time. But he knows so well how to use his voice that it is most pleasing to listen to him.

This is a costly production, with a hero who appears to be capable of doing in a few months what took Napoleon years to accomplish. The action takes place in the early eighteenth century and General Crack, played by Mr. Barrymore, is a half-caste gypsy, who derives his capacity for military strategy from his paternal relative, the Duke of Kurland, and his love of Bohemian melodies, vengeance and desire for romance from his mother, a gypsy dancer.

Alan Crosland, who directed "General Crack," is an expert in the grouping of a goodly number of persons, but he, like other directors under whom it has been Mr. Barrymore's misfortune to work, persists too much in having this excellent actor sacrifice naturalness to show his profile, an admirable one, one grants, but so is his full face.

General Crack harkens to the gypsy nature in him when bound to give military assistance to Leopold II of Austria. The strains of gypsy music cause him to halt, and love delays war, much to the alarm of Emperor Leopold, who has not only been asked to give half the gold in his coffers for Crack's help, but also to give in marriage, his sister, the Archduchess Maria Luisa, to the General.

Imagine then, after the bargain has been made, the displeasure of the Emperor when the redoubtable General finally turns up at the Austrian Court with a gypsy bride. It was, indeed, also a surprise to the spectators in the theatre, especially on the opening night, for on that occasion Marian Nixon, who figures as the charming Archduchess Maria Luisa, was herself introduced as the leading lady of the picture.

Armida, a dark-eyed actress, officiates as Fidelia, the gypsy wench who becomes the cynosure of all eyes in Leopold's court. As one sits witnessing the passing scenes of this film one realizes that Fidelia's marital career is not going to be a long one and that the beautiful Maria Luisa is probably going to leave the screen with General Crack as her husband. How is this going to be accomplished? Very simply—just by making the Emperor give a little less thought to war and a little more thought to love, and lo and behold! he is virtually what is known in the twentieth century as a corespondent.

General Crack—whose name is a nom de guerre made up of his initials, Prince Christian Rudolph Augustus Christopher Ketlar—had undertaken to win the war for Leopold, and he does so, despite the fact that he has proof that the Emperor and Fidelia had an affair while he (General Crack) was fighting for Austria. Therefore, Crack's gypsy blood asserts itself. After he is responsible for making Leopold ruler of the Holy Roman Empire, he decides to bring the Emperor down from his lofty perch. Being General Crack, this is accomplished in a relatively short time, so far as one can gather, and it is not long before Crack's officers bring in the Emperor's jeweled sword. Aye, and the Emperor would have been strung up on a specially constructed gallows had not General Crack taken the glorious Maria Luisa in his arms for a long and at the time a none too loving kiss. It was a kiss of revenge, because the Archduchess was Leopold's sister.

Good as many scenes are of this florid romantic affair, one rather longs to see Mr. Barrymore in a rôle a little less Don Juanesque and a little more lifelike. Here he is very much like the charming images one perceives on Dresden china. It will be nice to gaze upon him in a starched shirt, a modern dress suit and glistening patent leather shoes when he emerges on the screen in the talking pictorial conception of that bright comedy "The Man From Blankley's."

Mr. Barrymore has just the voice the screen needs. It is pleasingly incisive. There is never any doubt as to what he says and his gestures are invariably gracefully coupled with his utterances.

Among the imposing scenes in this production is one of the coronation in St. Gudule's Cathedral in Brussels. Part of the Technicolor is only fair, it being, as it frequently is, out of focus, but another sequence reveals some decidedly pleasing shades on the multicolored costumes of the large gathering.

The voices are admirably registered, but the dialogue is often wanting, except in the case where it is spoken by Mr. Barrymore.

SAD AND MERRY TALES TOLD BY SHADOWS

COLIN CLIVE, who was rushed through New York last week on his way from London to Hollywood to play in the Tiffany version of "Journey's End," exclaimed at our speed while being carried over the streets of New York. He was taken off the Homeric and transported to the Twentieth Century Limited, before, as he put it, he could say Jack Robinson.

He did, however, find time to comment on the similarity of American and British girls. Boarding the train he said:

"Where do I sleep?"

When told that a berth would be dropped down for him he put both hands to his head, sat down and at last burst out with:

"This is astounding. Just like 'Alice in Wonderland,' you know. I sit in a room without a bed, but it will appear from the ceiling. Next I expect to be serenaded by the Walrus and the Carpenter."

The lissom blonde, Catherine Dale Owen, who appeared opposite John Gilbert in "His Glorious Night," will next be seen in a film with Warner Baxter to be known as "Such Men Are Dangerous," based on a tale by Elinor Glyn. Albert Conti as well as Hedda Hopper, Claude Allister and Bela Lugos will help to prove such a man as Baxter impersonates is dangerous.

Because no workmen could be found who knew the art of making thatched roofs, John McCormack's Irish cottage, which will be seen in his forthcoming picture, was unthatched until a group of Austrian laborers were engaged to do the work in the Irish fashion.

Arthur Alexander, who wrote the ballet music in "Paris Bound," a film in which Ann Harding was starred, recently offered his opinions on the music of the future. "In ten years most of the good music of the world will be written directly for sound motion pictures," he said. "The opera and concert stage will be a thing of the past when music takes its place on the sound screen. Television will bring opera into the living rooms of the homes of the world."

Mr. Alexander's ballet music in the film was chosen by Eugene Goossens, the English musician, to be broadcast by the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra. His composition prior to the "Paris Bound" ballet was the incidental score for Eugene O'Neill's "Lazarus Laughed."

The "talking reporter" newsreel that Universal issues will be augmented by the voice of Graham McNamee, the radio announcer, who will assume the rôle of the unseen speaker explaining the news scenes.

The valet in "The Love Parade," Lupino Lane, will next be seen in a two-reel talking comedy, "Purely Circumstantial." In the cast are Phyllis Crane, Wallace Lupino and Betty Boyd.

A German version will be made of "Anna Christie," the talking film in which Greta Garbo is now acting for Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. Clarence Brown, who is directing the English version, will also supervise the foreign script with the assistance of a German expert. After finishing the O'Neill picture Miss Garbo will be starred in "Romance," a version of the play in which Doris Keane was seen here several seasons ago. Mr. Brown will also direct this film.

A new co-starring combination will be seen in "Slightly Scarlet" when Clive Brook and Evelyn Brent will appear together. This will be the first time these two players will be seen together since "Underworld." Fred Kohler, who played in that crook melodrama, will also have a part in the production. He has just completed a rôle in "The River Inn," with Helen Morgan, at the Paramount Astoria studios. The remaining cast includes Paul Lukas, Helen Ware, Henry Wadsworth, Virginia Bruce and Christiane Yves.

Another Lonsdale play will be made by Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer following their production of "The Last of Mrs. Cheyney." The forthcoming "The High Road" will feature Norma Shearer and will be directed by Sidney Franklin.

Rehearsals have started at the Paramount Astoria studio for "The Big Pond," in which Maurice Chevalier will be featured. Hobart Henley is directing this film with the aid of Bertram Harrison, a stage director. The picture is to be made both in English and French.

While some Hollywood motion picture companies are scrambling for S. S. Van Dine stories and the main character of Philo Vance changes faces in several films, Neil Hamilton will appear for the second time, so the announcement goes, in a Van Dine story. Mr. Hamilton, incidentally, is specializing in "X marks the spot" melodramas, having been seen previously in "Dr. Fu Manchu" and other thrillers.

An actress who has not yet been heard in talking pictures will soon appear in a Radio Pictures film, "Strictly Business," a story by Wallace Smith. She is Doris Kenyon, the wife of Milton Sills, and she has been studying voice culture in New York. Rod LaRocque will have the leading masculine part.

Some motion-picture producers and directors have recently been boasting that they used only a single microphone on a set. Notwithstanding, Marshall Neilan, who is directing a photoplay for Radio Pictures, offers the statistics of his recording outfit, which prove he used twelve microphones in a single garden sequence of "The Vagabond Lover," the film in which Rudy Vallée appears as the masculine leading player. The twelve recording instruments were employed because of the immensity of the stage which housed, in addition to the dancing chorus, Sally Blane, Marie Dressler, Charles Sellon, Eddie Nugent and others.

The two Rabelaisian portrayers of the screen, Victor McLaglen and Edmund Lowe, assisted by the timid El Brendel, will next appear in a film titled "Broad Minded," which Raoul Walsh will direct upon his return from abroad, where he has gone in hope of uncovering a new "find." The "find" will play the leading feminine rôle in a forthcoming production which is to be made on Grandeur film.

BROADWAY'S NEW FILM SHOWS

LENORE ULRIC is to be seen at the Roxy in "South Sea Rose." The screen story is based on the stage play, "La Gringa," by Tom Cushing, and deals with the romantic adventures of a French girl, born in the South Seas, who finds herself limited to the confines of a convent. A sea captain helps her escape from her oppressing environment. Daphne Pollard and Tom Patricola provide the comedy and Charles Bickford, Kenneth MacKenna, Elizabeth Patterson, Ilka Chase, George MacFarlane and Farrell MacDonald fill the other rôles.

THE background for "The White Sheik," the British silent film at the Little Carnegie, is taken from Rosia Forbes's novel, "King's Mate," a story of life among the Riffs. Warwick Ward plays the rôle of the White Sheik, who earns his name because of his efforts to aid the Riffs in their struggle for independence. Harley Knoles directed this film in which Lillian Hall-Davis, Jameson Thomas and Clifford McLaglen appear.

NEXT Wednesday evening "The Sky Hawk" will have its première at the Gaiety Theatre. This audible film is an adaptation of Llewellen Hughes's story, "Chap Called Bardell."

The leading rôle is portrayed by John Garrick, the British actor, who last appeared in a minor part in "Married in Hollywood." Helen Chandler is the principal female player in this story of an aviator who fights enemy planes single-handed during an air raid over London.

CARNIVAL life is the theme of Charles Rogers's newest vehicle, "Half Way to Heaven," at the Paramount. George Abbott directed this film, in which Jean Arthur is the leading female player. Others in the cast include Paul Lukas, Helen Ware and Guy Oliver.

ANOTHER of the Skinner series, this time "Skinner Steps Out," is at the Colony with Glenn Tryon in the main part. The film is the story of an office clerk who is a hero and efficiency expert to his adoring wife but only a dub in the office. Merna Kennedy plays the worshipful wife.

TOMORROW night "Hunting Tigers in India," will be shown at the George M. Cohan Theatre. This is a film record made by Commander G. M. Dyott of the Varney-Faunthorpe expedition to India under the auspices of the American Museum of Natural History. The silent scenes have had an explanatory voice added to them.

"Marco Himself" is the title of Jack Oakie's next film in which Harry Green will play the rôle of the manager of the down-and-out prizefighter depicted by Mr. Oakie. Richard Gallagher was to have had this part, but a change was made at a last moment. Harry Green will be remembered as the theatrical manager in "Close Harmony."

The eighteenth annual appeal for the Hundred Neediest Cases is made today.

FIRST FRENCH TALKIE FILMS IN PARIS

By W. L. MIDDLETON.

PARIS.

AFTER a period of hesitation we have at last before us some results of the first French efforts in audible screen production. It is natural that the producers should act with prudence. They are on the horns of a dilemma. If they make talkies, there are as yet few cinemas in the country equipped for them. If they make silent films they cannot sell them abroad. The position is curious. In the end, one would say, the vogue of talkies should work out to the advantage of the French industry, since it is able to produce directly for its own public in the French language. It is a makeshift arrangement to have dialogue films in English with a running translation or explanation in French flashed up beside them. But the time for confident action by the producers is not yet. In this country audible pictures are still in their infancy and, except in Paris, the public has had little opportunity of showing its reaction to them.

"Le Collier de la Reine" ("The Queen's Necklace") is very far from being a hundred per cent talkie, but it has one long and striking scene at the end which represents the whipping of a woman in public, and this is shown with the accompaniments of agonized cries and the shouting and tumult of a crowd, which enormously increase its effect. The musical accompaniment, which is continuous, is also registered throughout, which assures the film of the advantage of a good orchestra. It also guarantees the spiritual appropriateness of the music, which has been chosen with good taste by M. Andre Roubaud. Some of the old dances are exquisite.

Based on Fact.

M. Gaston Ravel and M. Tony Lekain have made their film out of the astonishing and true story of the $300,000 necklace bought ostensibly for Queen Marie Antoinette, and which ended with an immense court scandal, throwing some doubt, probably unjustified, on the honor of that great and ill-fated lady.

M. Ravel wisely starts with the idea of a film and not of a theatre play or a novel. His work is genuine cinema and the action goes with admirable pace and effect. He has done little violence to history, though he has strengthened the love motive beyond the warrant of the facts, a permissible liberty in romance. The film gives an excellent portrait of the strange and romantic Jeanne de Valois, who was an authentic descendant of King Henri II, by way of a love affair of that monarch in 1550. Jeanne, as a little girl, went in the streets of Paris begging alms for "an orphan of the blood of the Valois," attracted the attention of a lady of the court and received a pittance as a sort of pension. She was introduced to the Cardinal de Rohan, who is presented in the film as a charming man of the world but a deporable prelate. For years in something like disgrace at court, the Cardinal's chief desire—as represented in the story—is to regain the favor of the Queen. Jeanne, who has married a poor army officer and become Comtesse de la Motte, pretends that she has aroused the pity of Marie Antoinette and is on terms of affection with her royal relative. She has a way with her and completely imposed on the credulity of the Cardinal. She even persuades him to go to a midnight meeting with the Queen in the gardens of Versailles, dressing up a woman friend to play the part of Marie Antoinette for the occasion.

The Forged Signature.

Soon afterward she tells the Cardinal that the Queen wants to buy a great diamond necklace and wishes him to act as her intermediary in the transaction. The Cardinal signs an agreement to pay the jeweler, the contract bearing also the counter-signature of Marie Antoinette, forged by a lover of Jeanne. The necklace is then handed over to Jeanne for transmission to the Queen. It never reaches her, but goes to pay Jeanne's debts, establish her in a château and give her existence all the splendor of that of a grande dame. As no money comes from the Queen the Cardinal in his turn refuses to pay, and the plot is exposed by the jeweler going directly to the Queen with a letter praying for payment. The King has the Cardinal publicly arrested in the château of Versailles just before mass and, together with Jeanne de la Motte, brought before the judicial court of the Parliament. Jeanne, posing with all the dignity of a Valois, tries to brazen out the affair, denies everything and with supreme audacity attempts to throw suspicion both on the Cardinal and the Queen. The Cardinal is acquitted, but Jeanne is sentenced to be publicly whipped and branded as a thief.

In the film the Becky Sharp character of Jeanne comes out admirably in the acting of Marcelle Jefferson-Cohn. There is no audible dialogue throughout the greater part of the film.

SCREEN NOTES FROM LONDON TOWN

British Look Upon "Taming of Shrew" as an Excellent Spoof—Trade Show of Bilingual Picture—Galsworthy for Film Censor

By ERNEST MARSHALL.

LONDON.

"Yankee Doodle came to town,
Riding on his pony;
He stuck a feather in his cap,
And called it Macaroni."

ONLY in this case it was a jack-boot that Mr. Douglas Fairbanks put upon his head when as Petruchio he arrived to marry Katherine. "Doug" calls his "Taming of the Shrew" Shakespeare. London insists on calling it Macaroni. Rollicking good fun, if you please; but not Shakespeare, albeit Mr. James Agate contends in a foreword that there is not a spoken word which is not taken from the Shakespearean text, "Ipsissima verba!" By their words ye shall know them! By their deeds you shall forgive them—nay, even, you shall enjoy them mightily.

London's considered verdict upon "The Taming of the Shrew" as adapted by Sam Taylor from Will Shakespeare is that it is an excellent "spoof." The town is delighted; It has not enjoyed so good a joke for a long, long time. It knew that C. B. Cochran was "the world's greatest showman" (pace some others). It knew Miss Mary Pickford as "the world's sweetheart." It knew Mr. Fairbanks as "Our Doug" about as much as America's. It even believed that the London Pavilion was "the centre of the world" after having read so night after night on the electric signs that blazed in Piccadilly Circus. Mr. Cochran enjoys a jest as much as anybody, and he is reaping all the benefits (or a good part of them) from this one. The story goes that only Mr. George Bernard Shaw feels aggrieved. A certain Shakespeare who wasn't thought very much of in his own day, except as a poacher, had become a tradition—so much of a tradition that it was only Mr. Shaw in his abounding modesty who dared to assign to him a secondary place among the world's greatest dramatists. Mr. Shaw failed to drag him down from his pedestal so completely as Mr. Fairbanks—or is it Mr. Sam Taylor?—has done. Mr. Shaw can hardly sleep of nights thinking of the royalties he has missed. Even the "bardolators" have uttered no protests. They have been stricken dumb by the sheer audacity of the game that has been played upon them. They were invited to see Shakespeare on the film; they forgot all about the immortal bard and came away with their sides aching with their laughter at the drolleries of Douglas Fairbanks.

The Diabolical Screen.

It may be that there is a sentimental amorality about this utilization of a great name for purposes of advertisement. This is not, however, a censorious age; and when living authors fail to recognize their own handiwork in much of the matter which is shown upon the screen as their own production after it has passed through the multitudinous hands of scenario writers and cutters and directors and "tutti quanti," who is going to protest on behalf of a dramatist who died some centuries ago? In any case, London has enjoyed, and appears to be likely to continue to enjoy the joke at its own expense for some considerable time to come. One critic suggests that "The Taming of the Shrew" will prove a serious competitor to the pantomime which Sir Alfred Butt is to put on at Drury Lane for the Christmas holidays.

Mr. Cochran announces that he intends to take film work seriously. Before he begins actual work, however, he realizes he has a lot to learn, and all he at present is setting out to do is to supply the idea which his technical advisers will have to put into shipshape. Mr. Noel Coward is to be his bright particular star; but otherwise he will say nothing more definite till he returns from his trip to America. He designs to make his first film as attractive to American audiences as to British ones.

"Atlantic."

There was a "trade show" the other night of "Atlantic," described as "the world's first bilingual talkie." the German version of which was given a fortnight or so ago in Berlin; and if there is any justification in fact for some of the complimentary notices that have since found their way into print, it must be a quite wonderful production. There has, however, been so much preliminary "booming" of British films in trade and other papers that some slight skepticism may be excused. "Atlantic," in any case, will probably be shown on Broadway before it is seen publicly here. Some of the commentators who were present at the trade show suggest that the exhortation of the sinking ship's captain to his officers and crew to "be British" will not find universal favor. Still, one critic declares: "This is a film which will redeem the screen from the all too justifiable charge of meretriciousness. It is the 'Journey's End' of the screen." Another hardly thinks it so final a consummation, for he says: "With a few cuts and some speeding up, 'Atlantic' will be both a commercial and artistic success."

A Fervent Patriot.

Mr. Ernest Raymond was the author of "The Berg," the drama upon which "Atlantic" has been built. Mr. Raymond also wrote a novel which was given a vogue by the assiduities of an enthusiastic newspaper. Its title was "Tell England," from which it is apparent that the author is a fervent patriot, just as he showed himself to be by his exhortation to "be British" in "Atlantic." British Instructional Films have arranged to make an audible film of "Tell England" and they have enlisted the cooperation of the British Admiralty, which will place the whole Mediterranean fleet at their disposal next Spring. Mr. Anthony Asquith is to have charge of the production.

This same firm (B. I. F.) have just scored an unqualified success with a nature film punningly entiled "Peas and Q's," constructed around the growth and ultimate burial of that very delectable vegetable which is at its best when eaten with an Aylesbury duckling. There is real entertainment, not to speak of instruction, in films of this kind; and B. I. F. are going to produce a series of these talkers. Two of them are already practically completed and three others will shortly be put in hand. Anthony Asquith will introduce each one of the series "with a few words," and also supply the spoken commentary which takes the place of subtitles. The titles announced are: "Bath time at the Zoo," "The Merlin" and "The Mandew." "Peas and Q's" was shown along with "Mickey the Mouse" at the Pavilion in order to fill out the program, of which "The Taming of the Shrew" was the pièce de résistance. Of the success of both the hors d'oeuvre and the entrée there was no question.

A Lively Comedy.

Gainsborough has scored a qualified success with a rather pleasant little comedy entitled "Taxi for Two," in which Miss Mabel Poulton plays deliciously the rôle of a London shopgirl who is pursued by a shop-walker with designs that are nothing if not dishonorable, and has the luck to fall in her flight from him into the arms of a man who loves her well and true and who, in addition, is more than amply provided with this world's goods and can lift her out of her environment into a safe haven of wedding bells and orange blossoms. Miss Poulton, who was a typist before she went on the films, has hitherto played only minor parts, in one instance along with Miss Betty Balfour, who at that time completely overshadowed her. "Taxi for Two," which betrays every sign of having been started as a silent film, has had some talking sequences introduced, and in this respect suffers the usual handicaps of incongruity of methods. Miss Poulton is hailed as a "new British star" by some enthusiasts, and she certainly deserves some of the bouquets thrown at her feet. In the cast are included Gordon Harker, whose screen work is always of good quality, and John Stuart, whose voice is pleasant, but whose acting is somewhat heavy.

Galsworthy as Film Censor.

Among the recent American releases, "They Had to See Paris," with Will Rogers, has had the best press notices. "The Unholy Night," Mr. Lionel Barrymore's production, has not fared quite so well, though its thrilling qualities are recognized. Perhaps the chief grievance found against it was that London no longer experiences fogs of such pea-soup-like consistency as were common enough before the electrification of the underground.

With the passing away of T. P. O'Connor, M. P., the British Board of Film Censors lost its president. Among the several names mentioned so far for the succession is that of John Galsworthy. There is a salary of £2,000 ($10,000) attached to the post, and the duties are not too onerous. In fact, the great bulk of the work is done by a quartet of people who have only rarely called their president into consultation, particularly in these later years. A well-known name is of course required to give the decisions of the board any quality of authority, for the board has no official status, its members having been selected by the film trade itself and its fiats extending only over those producers, renters and exhibitors who choose to be bound by them. Any dissatisfied producer is at liberty to appeal over the head of the Board of Censors to local licensing authorities.

ON THE CINEMA HORIZON

METRO-GOLDWYN-MAYER is disguising the name of its newest talking film "Dulcy," in which Marion Davies has the leading rôle, with "Not So Dumb." King Vidor directed this audible picture, in the silent version of which Constance Talmadge appeared some time ago.

Another announced title change is "Happy Days," a whimsical bit, in preference to "Road Show," the film in which Bessie Love and Charles King, the team of "The Broadway Melody," are to be seen. The cast includes Marie Dressler, George K. Arthur, Jack Benny and Polly Moran.

In the absence of courses of specialized instruction in motion picture making at colleges it is necessary to turn for data to the past lives of men who now occupy directorial posts. Curiously, such a course seems to indicate that engineering training is the best background for a supervisor of screen drama.

A perfunctory survey of the directors of the Fox Films reveals that four formerly either studied or practiced the ways of an engineer. These are William K. Howard, John Blystone, Alan Dwan and Alfred Santell.

Mr. Dwan, an electrical engineer and a graduate of Notre Dame, makes charts of a picture before filming begins. In producing "Frozen Justice," in which Lenore Ulric is seen, Mr. Dwan attracted attention with a set of the interior of a ship built on a series of hydraulic jacks which imparted the rolling motion of heavy seas.

Various views expressed in The London Daily Telegraph about American motion-picture players and the talking films are of interest, especially one referring to Adolphe Menjou as "the successful French artist."

"A statement of great interest to British dramatists has been made by Edwin Carewe, the American producer of cinema plays, who has just arrived in Paris. Since the advent of the 'talkies,' he says, Hollywood is more and more dependent on Europe for ideas, and the English playwright is coming to the aid of this new development of the cinematographic art. While the writers at Hollywood were good enough for the silent film, it is to the English dramatist that the producers are looking for good dialogue, and it is admitted that he is supplying exactly what is wanted.

"Mr. Carewe's faith in the permanence of talking cinema plays is borne out by Adolphe Menjou, the successful French artist, who has signed a contract with a new company at a big figure. The income he received from his late firm was, he says, as much as $10,000 (£2,000) a week. He is of the opinion that the silent film is dead, and declares that thousands of artists who served to make them are now out of work.

"The French 'star' is wondering what will become of the incomparable Charlie Chaplin. Lili Damita, another Hollywood 'star' who is here, states that Chaplin is worried about the 'talkies,' and is studying them very attentively."

Following the "broad" trend in pictorial comedies, Universal is producing "Dames Ahoy," with Glenn Tryon in the leading rôle. Helen Wright, said to be a new find, will be seen as the leading lady. Others in the cast include Otis Harlan, Gertrude Astor and Eddie Gribbon.

FILM FLASHES

VICTOR SCHERTZINGER, who directed Adolphe Menjou's first and only American talking picture and who composed the music for "The Love Parade," will next direct Helen Kane in a musical photoplay at the Paramount Astoria studio. Mr. Schertzinger also played the rôle of one of the prime ministers in "The Love Parade," for the fun of it. His first production at the Long Island studio was "The Laughing Lady," with Ruth Chatterton and Clive Brook.

Within eight months, Chandler Sprague has realized his ambition of studying production from three important angles—writing, supervising, and now directing. He has been signed to a new contract by Fox Films which affords him an opportunity to direct talking pictures. He already has gained first-hand knowledge of the other production activities of talking pictures as a member of the Fox Movietone production cabinet.

Mr. Sprague's first connection with Fox Films was in February of this year when he was signed as scenario editor. He was a newspaper reporter before becoming a writer for the screen.

Another of those tentative Hollywood titles, this time "Faithful," is the one being attached momentarily to Billie Dove's forthcoming production, which is based upon an English play by Audrey and Waverly Carter. Basil Rathbone, who was last seen in "The Last of Mrs. Cheney," will appear in the leading masculine rôle with Kenneth Thomson, Kay Francis, Montague Love and Philip Strange.

The bibulous character in "Young Nowheres," Bert Roach, is to be seen in "Song of the Flame," a Technicolor operetta, with Bernice Claire and Alexander Gray.

FILM NEWS FROM THE FRENCH CAPITAL

By MORRIS GILBERT.

PARIS.

THE motion picture industry in France was a subject of much debate in the French Congress last Summer, since it was felt that American films were driving the native product out of the market. There was a tax on foreign pictures already, importers being required to buy French ones in a certain proportion to the number they brought into the country. Legislators were being urged to raise this quota.

Speeches in and out of the Chamber became acrid. The American film "invasion" was called a menace to French manners, French speech and the training of French youth. Patriotic French producers pointed out that even in the United States the manners of Hollywood had not always been regarded as fostering the Spartan virtues, and, they argued, if Hollywood could be considered bad for America, how much worse it conceivably could be for France.

A shudder ran through the American picture world. Such attacks on a large industry were nothing short of scurrilous, it was felt and said. Here diplomats intervened, thus removing the dispute from a commercial to a moral plane. The diplomats undertook to reach what is called an "agenda" or "formula," which is what vulgar undiplomatic people recognize as a "trade" or "swap." So the matter rests.

Meanwhile, the cinemas of Paris and the provinces stay open. The American "invasion" doesn't seem to be slowing down. About the Grand Boulevard American films are numerous. French children and their elders go to them, presumably unaware of danger of foreign contamination. The beauties of our screen exhibit their refined charms without assault from embittered natives. Nobody has declared a boycott on Fay Wray, Mary Duncan, Anita Page, Harold Lloyd, Jolson or Chaplin.

Probing for Reactions.

With leaders of industry, diplomacy and morals thrashing out these problems, it seemed only courteous to try to become acquainted with them at first hand from the modest point of view of a reporter. It was clear that one would not find a true reaction in the busy quarter of the cosmopolitans. From the Boulevard de la Madeleine eastward far along the Boulevard des Italiens—where East meets West and shakes hands with North and South—American films such as "Broadway Melody" and French films such as "The Three Masques" and "The Queen's Necklace" draw an attendance as heterogeneous as the shipping in the Panama Canal, perhaps more so.

To learn what menace the French middle class, the backbone of the race, was undergoing from the cinema, it seemed best to try a smaller theatre in one of the less international districts. If one should see children running from the doors at the end of the reel to commit trunk murders or other crimes of passion and singing or whistling "That's My Weakness Now," the evidence of the truth of the attacks on our films might be taken as circumstantial. The theatre was picked by opening a map of Paris, shutting the eyes and setting down a forefinger. It came down in the Seventh Arrondissement, that noble section on the Left Bank which contains the Palais Bourbon, where France's Congress holds its sessions; the Invalides, where Napoleon is entombed, and the Cirque de Paris, where Benny Valger fought last Tuesday night. The theatre nearest the finger was the Récamier, on the street of that name, just off the Rue de Sèvres and a few steps from the Boulevard Raspail.

It was a very good choice, a neighborhood theatre of the better class, unpretentious, clean, fairly new, popular and filled with French people. The best seats in the house were selling at ten francs apiece, which, with a modest tip to the usher, amounted in United States currency to approximately 40 cents.

"Le Désir" was playing, a silent pictorial story of the Sahara. It concerned a beautiful native girl and a feud between native tribes on her account. Desert scenes abounded, and the life of the nomads was shown with detail and good effect.

"Le Désir."

Strangely enough, there was no white woman concerned with the plot, no fragile product of Park Avenue or the Rue de la Paix or Belgrave Square, who, at a certain point in the story's development, would find herself the prey of an unscrupulous sheik. This oversight was hard to understand, particularly as the heroine's beauty—as made up, at least—seemed to be indigenous to North Africa, not a cinema lot. In other words, "Le Désir" appeared a modest and sincere effort to weave a story out of a purely native life and customs, using native types throughout, and perhaps not deviating very much from what might be entirely plausible.

Here it became evident that French manners, customs and the training of the young were safe and that the dangers of foreign contamination had been repulsed for the moment, for "Le Désir" is a French picture. No word of English was flashed on the screen, and there were no other signs of American—or Hollywood—influence.

France, everybody knows, is the second largest colonial empire in the world, and her possessions in North Africa give her an exceptional chance for developing the kind of picture described here. Quantities of French people are absorbed in those possessions, through the presence of relatives and friends on military duty there, through developing business interests, through travel. The field would appear to be wide open for French film companies to make first-hand pictures down there, similar to "Grass" or "Chang," and a beginning seems to have been made, unpretentiously, with "Le Désir." It was a very good program picture without sensational qualities.

So far, then, French culture seemed to be holding its own. But the evening was not over. The custom at the Récamier, as at other Paris neighborhood theatres, is to offer a second film instead of repeating one feature in an evening at the "second show." The second picture last night was foreign. It was German, a U. F. A. comedy, called in the French, "Amour, où mènes-tu nous?"

French Culture Still Safe.

To be sure, the commercial and diplomatic tangle of last Summer was directed, according to expert observers, principally at American films. There are many pictures of other nationalities shown in Paris during the year, but the American outnumbered them. So, the evening at the Récamier might, after all, be considered lacking in any menace such as was predicted by French Deputies and producers last July, since it had no trace of transatlantic influence.

The story of "Amour, où mènes-tu nous?" was laid, indeed, in Paris. It was a sprightly production, a kind of Clara Bow-Kiki performance played by Lillian Harvey with hoydenish zeal. Cinderella-like, a young lady porch-climber wakes to find herself the ward of a handsome young nobleman. She makes a great sacrifice, submitting to false accusations of theft, and actually committing another in order to save the sister of the young nobleman from disgrace. All is explained at the end and life rings merry as a marriage bell. Nobody could take the piece very seriously, but then, who would want to?

So the evening came to an end. As a contribution to the facts of the Franco-American quota feud, it appears to have been a failure. But it indicated that in one, at least, of the Parisian neighborhood cinema houses this week diverting and not too serious entertainment could be found, even without the benefit of direction from overseas.

PUDOVKIN ON SOUND

WITH recent dispatches from Moscow telling of the successful showing in the Soviet capital of the first dialogue picture produced by the Sovkino, interest is focused on the views on the sound film expressed by V. L. Pudovkin in a late issue of the Licht-Bild-Bühne of Berlin. In the course of an interview the director of "The End of St. Petersburg," "Mother," "Storm Over Asia" and other notable Russian productions, said:

"The triumphant march of the sound film can no longer be halted, but I regard the methods used today in producing the sound film as mistaken and not quite corresponding to the object sought. Take the American sound films, for instance. They certainly are technically all right and reproduce the sounds well. But, after all, they only amount to artistic trifling. The spoken word is used, just because it is a sound film, but it seems to me that it is merely dovetailed in. It is like a flourish, a pretty ornament, that could just as well have been left out.

New Ideas for Sound.

"It hardly is necessary to enrich a distant action with words. A situation where a man kisses a woman doesn't need to be accentuated or enlivened by the broken sentence, 'I love you!' I have quite a different idea of the genuine meaning and the real possibilities of applying sound to the films.

"Take the following film situation: A woman accompanies her husband to the railroad station. The train is about to start. Suddenly it occurs to the woman that she has something of importance to say to her man. But at that moment she can't remember it. And while she is desperately trying to think she hears—a hallucination!—the hissing of the locomotive's steam, the grinding of the wheels. In her excitement—she knows that in a few seconds her husband will be gone—she isn't able to collect her thoughts; the noise of the departing train sounds in her ears—but the train is still standing there.

"A Means of Dramatic Expression."

"This noise ought to add unheard-of intensity to the dramatic situation. Here sound is justified and is properly employed, because here it is the most powerful means of dramatic expression.

"Sound must not be used merely for sound's sake! This is my position in regard to the sound film, which I have outlined but briefly in this example.

"In Russia we don't want to put the theatre upon the screen, but we want to create a new means of expression."

IN CZECHOSLOVAKIA

ALTHOUGH President Thomas G. Masaryk recently sent a message of greeting to President Hoover and to the Czechoslovaks living in the United States by means of a talking news film, Czechoslovak producers thus far seem to be limiting themselves to silent, or at the most semi-sound, screen efforts. In reporting the recent showing in Prague of "Jeki Pastorkyna," the picture version of the opera "Jenufa" produced by the Republic Film, with R. Mestak as director and E. Smolik as chief photographer, the Prager Presse makes no mention of any singing, although warm praise is given to the acting of Thilda Ondra of the New German Theatre as Jenufa and Gabriele Horvatova, a singer of the Czech National Theatre, as Kilstrin. Both were making their film débuts. One critic noted that if the picture were destined for export the rather dry subtitles ought to be cut out and livelier and more instructive ones substituted. The story follows the original only in a very general way and there is the usual happy ending apparently demanded by Czechoslovak film followers as well as those of other countries.

Rather slow progress is being made with the filming of the life of St. Vaclav, the patron saint of Czechoslovakia, whose thousandth anniversary was celebratad this year. When the scenario was finished and production begun last August it was thought that the picture might be ready for the principal features of the celebration, but according to reports in Prague papers of recent date, it will not be ready before January. Thus far it has cost 2,500,000 crowns (worth 3 cents each) and the total expense will be enormous, measured in Czechoslovak values. The construction work in the Prague Stadium has kept 130 men busy since Sept. 2, and the end is not yet. The costuming and the host of actors are calculated to make the film of great ethnological and historical value and it is expected to make a great impression abroad, as well as at home. Dr. J. Kolar is the director.

According to the latest available statistics, there are 1,668 moving picture houses in Czechoslovakia, of which 112 are in Prague. The average seating capacity is put at 300. In the Slovak part of the republic there are 215 kino houses, but in the mountains of Carpathian Ruthenia their number is only twenty-two.

THE DANCE: MASTER'S WORK

Movement in England to Keep Alive the Traditions of Serge Diaghileff

By JOHN MARTIN.

A MOVEMENT has been launched in London under the auspices of The Drancing Times to establish a memorial fund by which to honor the career and achievements of Serge Diaghileff in the world of the dance. In a letter printed in that publication, in which the subject was first broached, Cyril W. Beaumont, vice president of the Cecchetti Section of the Imperial Society of Teachers of Dancing, wrote in part as follows:

"Unquestionably the Diaghileff company has inspired us all with the desire to see a national ballet of our own, and many of our dancers have been brought up on the Diaghileff tradition and received inspiration from the classic artistry of his productions, which has been and will be of inestimable value to them in their careers. Much of the great improvement in the standard of training in our schools of dancing, and the whole of the extraordinary growth of interest here in ballet as an art form may be traced to the same source.

"* * * Diaghileff's achievements are well known to the present generation, but will this knowledge be so general fifty years hence? It is doubtful. For this reason I am firmly of the opinion that we should make an effort to preserve for all time the name of Serge Diaghileff, as a tribute to his great advancement of the art we revere and as a slight token of appreciation for all that he has done to afford dancers inspiration.

"I suggest, therefore, that measures be taken immediately to open a fund, to be called the Diaghileff Memorial Fund. All contributions shall be invested to provide an annual sum for the establishment of some form of dance scholarship. By associating with such award the name of Serge Diaghileff, that name and the achievements connected with it would be preserved, and to useful purpose. I would further propose that the administration of such a fund be vested in a small committee which should be as representative as possible of the several schools of technique, in order that the tribute should partake of a universal character."

To date the idea has received much favorable attention and the names of some of the most important dancers of the day have already been listed as contributors. A similar proposal was made shortly after the London announcement, by a correspondent to The Dance Magazine of New York, and was referred by them to the London fund, so that there might be no duplication of effort.

Unquestionably it is an idea that will be generally applauded, for the respect of the public throughout the greater part of the world was profound for the erratic but progressive genius of the Russian artist-impresario. Where it seems likely that there will be dissent is in the form which the memorial is to take. It is scarcely within the bounds of probability that followers of the modern schools of free movement will be particularly enthusiastic about contributing to the establishment of a scholarship by which any one might be taught the principles of the classic ballet, to which they are fundamentally opposed. There is, as well, little hope that practitioners of the Italian-French method in its purity will look with favor on the subsidy in even so small a measure of the radical, futuristic, acrobatic style to which Diaghileff himself was so prone in his last productions.

Problem of a Memorial.

Certainly to provide means for a young student to learn the rudiments of the art according to the canons which Diaghileff arose to abolish would not be exactly consistent with the general purpose of a memorial. The problems involved are decidedly delicate ones which, if handled with anything but the height of tact, might easily wreck the whole project.

This would be a most unfortunate thing to happen for two reasons: first, because a memorial designed to honor a distinguished artist if allowed to fail through want of support or through internal bickering would become something of a negative tribute; second, because the combined interest of a considerable number of people expressed in the contribution of money as well as in the desire to work together for a common end can be turned to excellent purpose. If, for example, the income from the Diaghileff memorial fund were used in some manner less directly associated with the form of his art and more directly associated with its spirit and intention, surely the difficulties of the situation would be alleviated and at the same time his purposes and aims might be perpetuated instead of merely his name and reputation. He himself, in a letter to The London Times shortly before his death, stressed the fact that "the forms change" and the spirit alone endures. It would seem idle, then, to attempt to carry on in the personal idiom of Diaghileff even if such were possible, and worse than idle to substitute another idiom in his name.

One aspect of his work, however, can be perpetuated and needs to be. Probably more than any other single individual or group of individuals, he brought the dance to the mind of the public as a dignified, distinguished, adult art. What this means we cannot fully appreciate because for the last twenty years the "Ballets Russes" have served constantly to enlighten the lay world and we have little memory of the darkness that existed before. It is not altogether foreign to our experience, however, even now; the dancer is constantly being asked for meaning and symbolism on the one hand, and for acrobatics and tricks on the other. The grasp of his art as an independent one with a validity as unimpeachable as that of music or painting, is possessed by a comparatively small percentage of the populace. During the past few years, it is true, this percentage has been increasing at a gratifying rate, but there is still much to be accomplished.

The national ballet of which Mr. Beaumont speaks in his letter, whether it be in England or America, cannot be brought into being simply by collecting or training a sufficient number of good dancers and giving them adequate financial support. It requires just as much the collecting of a broad and sympathetic audience. Diaghileff devoted himself to both aspects of this problem; he developed an amazing number of artists of high rank, and he also spread his gospel far and wide, even though not always with the greatest show of wisdom and policy.

Of talented material we have an abundance, of competent teachers we also have an eminent sufficiency. The mere business of paying for tuition does not often stand in the way of an eager and gifted young aspirant. Would it not be possible and desirable, therefore, for the small committee suggested by Mr. Beaumont to turn its mind to the devising of some method by which the income from the memorial fund might be used to build audiences?

Perhaps this is too strictly an American point of view to seem practical or desirable to the committee. Perhaps we carry our advertising theories to extremes, and perhaps also it might not be thought entirely consonant with the dignity of the dance art to subject it to commercial practices. Nevertheless, the value of widespread public education has been found to be incalculable to other enterprises seemingly as remote from the marts of commerce as dancing, and there is every reason to believe that it would prove to be so in this case as well. At least, it would be an adventure, and as such fraught, one believes, with fewer perils than the plan now under consideration.

Three recitals are to be seen this evening, none of which is a "first time." At the Craig Theatre Harald Kreutzberg and Yvonne Georgi, returned from triumphant appearances in Boston and Toronto, will combine some of the dances out of last year's program with some out of this year's. Among them will be "The Angel of Annunciation," "Revolte," "Kassandra," "Capriccio" and the "Russian Dance." The dancers will leave during the week for a tour which will take them as far as the Pacific Coast, and will probably not be seen in New York again until Spring.

At the Booth, Angna Enters gives the third and last of her concerts hereabouts. She will introduce her tenth new composition of the season, entitled "Antique in the English Manner—Rosetti, Ltd.," and will also include its companion piece, "Saturnalia—Antique a la Française."

At the Guild, Ruth Page will make her second and final appearance before sailing to Europe, where she will dance by special invitation with the Moscow Symphony Orchestra. She will be assisted this evening by Frank Parker in his "chansons mimées." Mr. Parker will also dance in two of the numbers as Miss Page's partner. With the exception of two new dances, a Chopin etude and "The Flapper Goes Oriental," Miss Page's program will be the same as that offered at her recent recital.

On Friday afternoon, La Argentina will return to New York for a special matinee performance at Town Hall. She will also be seen at the same place on the afternoon of Dec. 17 and the evening of the 19th, before leaving for her second transcontinental tour.

Next Sunday Hans Wiener, assisted by a small group, will give his first recital of the season at the Broadhurst Theatre. It was originally announced to take place at the Eltinge.

Carola Goya, whose appearance on Dec. 29 at Hampden's Theatre has already been announced, will also dance on the two Sundays immediately following at the same theatre.

The annual guest meeting of the New York Society of Teachers of Dancing, Inc., will be held this morning at the Hotel Astor, beginning at 11 o'clock. A special program will be offered.

Margaret Severn announces that she will give two recitals in January at a theatre as yet undecided upon. She will be assisted by a group of twelve girls whom she has been training since last Spring. Several of the dances will employ masks of Miss Severn's own creation.

MOUNTAINEERS TAKE UP TOY-MAKING

Isolated Farmers Turn to This New Craft to Eke Out an Income

THE Alleghanies are gorgeous when painted with the dull golds and deep maroons of a Virginia Autumn. They rise from the softly rolling land of the Shenandoah Valley like a misty wall. Behind them the sun sets, and there is a finality about its disappearance that might well have stopped spirits less sturdy than those of the early pioneers from any desire to see what lay behind that mountain barrier.

But on closer acquaintance it proves to be not so much an impenetrable wall as a series of walls whose ends overlap. It is a kind of mountain labyrinth in which he who has the key may find pocket valleys and brawling streams, lost acres of flat land spread there by miniature Niles, and curving passes that promise fresh delights as they lure one deeper and deeper into the misty maze.

It was these beckoning passes that the early settlers followed, and in these lost valleys that they and their children stayed. Now, thanks to the light that plays about everything that interests President Hoover, America is rediscovering its pioneers. One group of their descendants are neighbors of the President in the Rapidan country, and he has become so interested in them and their children, so aware of the problems which confront them, that he is supplying them with a much needed school.

A Community Helps Itself.

Another and a very different group further south, stemming perhaps from a different racial strain, is trying to solve its own problems through a new community venture in developing its local resources.

Twelve miles back of any road which could be called "automobile conscious," in a fold of the Alleghanies which lies between sheer Supinlick and the Great North Mountain, the Shenandoah Community Workers are making toys. They cut them out of flat slabs of native pine, paint them in the gayest colors, and out of their very simplicity evoke both charm and personality. The most svelte and lissome of tigers leans against a post. Beside him stands a pleased puppy looking as though he had just chewed up the family shoes. There are aldermanic bear cubs fashionably curved, and ponies that seem actually to curvet. Pigs shine in an incredible pinkness, turkeys swell to gleaming white circles, there is an authentic purple cow.

There are nineteen animals listed in all and a whole aviary of birds. None of them boasts more than a hint of a third dimension. They are almost as simple as silhouettes, and yet somehow they are distinct and delightful individuals. They have that alert freshness which one associates with European peasant work, but which was almost entirely vanished from American toys when they grew complex.

The shops and the workmen are unpretentious and charming, like their product. The industry is as complete an example of vertical organization on a small scale as any Mr. Ford has evolved on a large one. From the dark "bull pine" growing on the hillsides to the gay toy wrapped and stamped for mailing, all the processes of manufacture take place in the tiny valley. Axemen whose skill is a family tradition cut out the necessary trees according to approved methods of forestry. There is a portable sawmill and a kiln for drying the boards it produces. Electricity runs machinery that cuts and sandpapers elephants and ducks. Compressed air makes a paintbrush so diverting that Kipling, could he have foreseen it, would have put it into heaven in place of "brushes of comets' hair." The men make their own shipping cases and display signs; they have even established their own postoffice so that toys could be mailed direct from Bird Haven.

So complete, so self-sustaining is the venture that it reminds one of childhood stories of the men that make toys in Germany's Black Forest. And it is even possible that the enthusiasm of the workmen, the skill with which they handle toys and work out new methods, may partly be explained on the ground of heredity. For this is a German community, whose ancestors may very well have been bearded men bending over wooden animals in the Schwarzwald.

It is German in no modern sense. These men with long slim fingers and quiet faces are, if length of residence counts, more American than many a daughter of the American Revolution. Their families came to this country long before anybody thought of having a revolution. Their ancestors probably drifted down from Pennsylvania about 1730, when the more northern State was filling up with too many people, and free land was advertised in Virginia. Their names are solidly German, and while few of them speak their ancestral tongue, they remember that grandmother always talked it, and grandfather used it when he was "feelin' right spry."

To call them a community is perhaps to give them too imposing a name. They do not live in a closely built settlement, there is nothing near by which resembles a village. Their homes are in separate cabins and on scattered farms. Each one prizes a pocket of valley land, or perches on the mountain side where a tilted field may be plowed.

People like this, isolated though they are, have a stamina and a sturdiness which enable them to escape problems sometimes present in lost valleys. Their woes are largely economic. There is not enough money. There are not enough opportunities for earning it. So they must do without many of the things that city people find essential.

It was to help solve this question of money, to provide wages for filling in the gaps, that the Shenandoah Community Workers first ventured into business. They might never have had the ability to do it, the necessary knowledge of markets and processes, had it not been for the capable person who is their friend. A business man with a factory in Philadelphia, he inherited a mountain farm and with it a sense of responsibility toward his neighbors. His was good land wedged into a fork in the hills, and it would have made a pleasant vacation home for him had he chosen to take it that lightly. But the people and their problems fascinated him, and he set about trying to find some native industry or resource that could be sold in modern markets.

Plenty of "Bull Pine."

Agriculture was out of the question. The land was not good enough and the hauling was too difficult. Old furnaces in the hills testified to a small amount of mineral wealth, but it was too scattered. Timber was poor, "bull pine" full of knots and as stubborn as its name.

Yet there was plenty of it, and plenty of nothing else. The men of the hills were skilled in its handling, being descendants of generations expert with the axe, and if some use could be found for it whereby it could be cut into lengths short enough to avoid knots, it might solve the problem. Toys were the immediate answer—toys and other delightful things that are in the making and the planning.

It is all an attempt to take advantage of the natural resources and interests of the community and turn them into marketable form. Since the limelight was turned on these lost communities there has been much vague talk of "improving" them. There have been investigations and reports, comments and descriptions meant to be humorous and succeeding chiefly in being cruel. One might almost think that the settlements were a kind of human zoo whose inhabitants performed like monkeys, and with no more sensitiveness, for the sophisticated folk who went about poking into their homes.

The Shenandoah Community Workers have escaped all that.

FORD'S SCHOOL RECALLS SEVERE OLD TEXTBOOKS

The McGuffey Reader and Even the Spelling Book Sternly Admonished Wayward Young

THE village school that Henry Ford has restored at Fort Dearborn, Mich., is equipped with a supply of the old McGuffey textbooks. To those whose grade school education was acquired in the earlier decades following the Civil War and even before, the name McGuffey conjures up the image of a single-room country school lined with blackboards and heated by a wood-burner, as likely as not a "Round Oak."

Moralizing schoolday lessons amplified and supported the sermons preached in the crossroads churches on Sundays and during revivals. Even learning to spell provided the means of prodding an apathetic or slumbering conscience. The McGuffey Eclectic Spelling Book, 1846 edition, presented a sermon to the heedless young in the "Flower Girl," which read in part as follows:

"Emma did as her mother told her. She planted the seeds and when her flowers came up she took great care of them. After a little while they were full of blossoms and she has now just as many as she wants. See how happy she looks. It is always best to go to work with patience, and in the right way, and then everything will come out right."

The book also had some comments on learning to read. Under an engraving of a strangely quiescent boy seated between his two sisters, who seem to be the listeners, is printed:

"This boy and his sisters love each other very much and study and learn very well. It is not so with all children. Some want to play even in school.

"Once a little boy in school, too lazy to study, stole a pin. He next stole a pair of shoes and then a roll of cloth, and so on, till he was put in jail for some great crime and condemned to be hung. And all this came from his being idle and his stealing a pin."

The Second Reader of the 1853 edition taught the little folk of the day that pets might acquire a code of behavior that should put the ordinary child to shame. The brief narrative of "The Little Dog Fido," for example, included this characterization:

"One day his master stooped down and patted him on the head and spoke so kindly that Fido was ready to go out of his wits with joy. He took care, however, not to be troublesome by leaping upon his master with dirty paws, nor would he follow him into the parlor unless he was asked. He also tried to make himself useful by a number of little services."

Another lesson in this book prophesied a lonely life for the boy who told lies. The author familiarly named the bleak tale merely "George and the Hatchet." It contained the lines:

"But, oh! George, how far from this is the case with the boy who is given to lying! Good people avoid him wherever he goes, and parents dread to see him in company with their children.

"Oh, George, my son, rather than see you come to this pass, dear as you are to me, gladly would I assist to nail you up in your little coffin and follow you to your grave."

The response that young scions of progressive education might make to these books would in some measure show the extent to which modern education has progressed.

A SHRINE TO ST. ANN.

CONSTRUCTION in New Orleans of a national shrine of St. Ann, to cost $5,000,000 and to be the world's largest, will begin within five years and will be completed in 1936, according to recent announcement of Father Francis Badeaux, director and treasurer of the Archfraternity of St. Ann. The building, which will be modeled after St. Paul's basilica in Rome, will accommodate 2,000 persons.

NEWS AND COMMENT OF THE CURRENT WEEK IN MUSIC

THE ORIGINAL "BORIS"

Some Questions Answered by Stokowski's American Premiere in Philadelphia

By OLIN DOWNES.

THE first performances in America of Moussorgsky's original version or versions of "Boris Godunoff," including the composer's orchestration, were given by Leopold Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra on Nov. 29 and 30 and Dec. 2 in the Philadelphia Academy of Music. These performances answered in a fairly conclusive way several questions which have long been matters of rumor and discussion and diverse opinion.

The curious and dramatic history of Moussorgsky's master work—for master work it is and will remain, despite the presence of an unusual number of inequalities and defects of workmanship—has been recounted in these columns, and the controversy which has lasted for twenty-one years among Moussorgsky students and critics regarding Rimsky-Korsakoff's editings of the music has been outlined. The Moussorgsky true-believers hold that the careful, numerous and scholarly revisions of Moussorgsky by Rimsky-Korsakoff are criminally misrepresentative of the highly original and dramatic genius of the first-named musician, while the followers of Rimsky-Korsakoff, whose names are great and legion—Mr. Toscanini and Mr. Glazunoff are among them—insist with equal conviction that "Boris Godunoff" owes its very life to the saving craftsmanship and orchestral knowledge of Rimsky-Korsakoff, who came to the aid of his departed colleague with a sincerity, modesty and fidelity past praise, and gave the score of "Boris" the clarity and effectiveness without which it could never have held its place in the theatre.

Curious conditions kept this discussion at boiling point without either side being able to support its contentions with conclusive evidence for many years. In the first place, the 1874 version of the vocal score of the opera had almost disappeared from print until it was reissued by Bessel five years ago and reprinted by other firms, including J. & W. Chester, Ltd., of London. This version, moreover, which provided the Moussorgsky protagonists with their ammunition, had not been given on the stage in the memory of many living people. It was possible for the opponents of Rimsky-Korsakoff to make damaging comparisons between the two works by citing differences known to exist between his editions and the one that more nearly represented Moussorgsky, and the Godets, d'Alheims, Calvocoressis and others of their suasion availed themselves brilliantly of this material. But notes on paper are one thing and performances on the stage another. The proof of an opera is in the performance. We do not know of a performance of the 1874 version of "Boris Godunoff" after the first Rimsky revision appeared in 1896.

THE supporters of Rimsky-Korsakoff could point to the effectiveness of his version; the protesting Moussorgsky camp could only scold and issue, for those who really cared to look into the question, such documents as Godet's "En Marge de Boris Godunoff." As a matter of fact, few composers have been held in as varying esteem through as many years as Moussorgsky, aside from the moot point of "Boris." We find such a critic as Ernest Newman pooh-poohing him, and others, of fully equal sagacity, designating him as an artist who still holds an advanced position in modern music. While the critics of Rimsky-Korsakoff were arguing, and, one fears, in some cases seizing greedily upon the "Boris" question as a rich material for feuilletons and critical polemics, the Rimsky-Korsakoff version of the work pursued its triumphal and virtually undisputed way. It is asserted, by the way, in some quarters that under any circumstances "Boris" is not a popular opera, but one that owes public patronage in New York to Chaliapin in the title rôle. This is a misleading conclusion, not supported by facts. The fact is that Mr. Chaliapin's magnificent portrayal of the character of Boris had nothing whatever to do with its unquestionable success when it was produced by the Metropolitan Opera Company for the first time in America in March, 1913, not with Chaliapin but with Didur in the title part, and with Toscanini as conductor. But it is true that only the presence of a Chaliapin in the cast could save the opera from quick extinction through such perfunctory and second-rate performances as have been given the opera by the Metropolitan in late seasons.

But there was no opportunity in the world to hear "Boris Godounoff" as Moussorgsky completed it sixty years ago until Feb. 16, 1928, when the opera, following its publication by the Soviet State from the composer's original manuscripts, was given in its authentic form in the same theatre at Leningrad, in which, in clipped and distorted shape, it first saw the light in 1874.

Here, for better or worse, was the real "Boris." Soon after the Leningrad première, the Oxford University Press published an imprint of the vocal text with Mr. Calvocoressi's English translation. Then, last Spring, March 5, 1929, the Stanislawsky Opera Theatre of Moscow mounted the newly published version. It was the writer's privilege to hear repetitions of that production in Moscow last May. While they revealed much that was new, and cleared up some matters that were old, they left some questions unanswered, the most important of which was the value of Moussorgsky's orchestration. Of the precise effect of that orchestration it was impossible to judge, for several reasons. In the first place, the orchestra at Moscow was a small one, and not very expert or finished in the technical sense. In the second, the theatre, the stage, the orchestra pit and the chorus were small, of far more modest dimensions than Moussorgsky conceived and insignificant in comparison with the implications of his score. On the small stage all sorts of devices had to be followed to convey the sense of vast and tragic national drama, and contrive practical arrangements for the placing, the movement, the vocal effectiveness of chorus and principals. In the orchestra pit there were related problems. In some passages of the opera these conditions favored Moussorgsky, whose orchestral scheme is thinner and lighter and more intimate in effect than Rimsky-Korsakoff's. In other places the ineffectiveness of the orchestral tone could be attributed to various causes, and therefore it was not possible to arrive at any very definite conclusions about this phase of the matter.

THE orchestration of Moussorgsky was put to a fair test last week in Philadelphia with the complete Philadelphia Orchestra, and with the eloquent and dramatic Leopold Stokowski wielding the baton. From this very illuminating occasion, which it took a musician and conductor of Mr. Stokowski's enterprise and enthusiasm for his art to provide, one person at least derived a few impressions and convictions which are here set down for whatever they may be worth.

(1) It is evident that Moussorgsky's orchestration is on the whole greatly inferior to and far less effective than Rimsky-Korsakoff's. Whether Rimsky-Korsakoff correctly carries out the composer's purpose in his instrumental scheme is another matter, which can never be satisfactorily decided. But it seems certain that in spite of some original and highly illuminative spots in Moussorgsky's orchestral score, it cannot as it stands be profitably utilized in the theatre.

(2) Most, though not all, of Rimsky-Korsakoff's changes of Moussorgsky's rhythms, meters, harmonies, tonalities and melodic lines are distortions, however well meant, of Moussorgsky's ideas, which in the majority of cases weaken and conventionalize the effect of his music. In a few instances they give Moussorgsky advantageous grammatical correction or formal symmetry. Moussorgsky's music should, in the majority of cases, be restored to its original form, but the orchestration of Rimsky-Korsakoff, in default of other scoring more sympathetic to Moussorgsky's ideas, should be used, and probably always will be. When scenes and passages hitherto deleted from the opera in stage performance are restored as they should be for the proper and most effective presentation of the work, a reorchestration of those passages which Rimsky-Korsakoff did not touch could be undertaken by a musician of imagination and technical mastery.

(3) The final conclusion is simply this: that in spite of all the republications, restorations, performances and what not, inside Russia as well as out, "Boris Godunoff" has yet to be given its proper and most effective presentation to the public. This is on account of the persistent inclusion of the Polish scenes, which Moussorgsky, forced to follow bad advice, never wanted in the opera. These scenes are long, ineffective, incongruous with the rest of the work and subversive of the composer's real purpose.

THE Polish episodes do show us the invading Dmitri—which Moussorgsky obviously intended not to be seen by the audience after the early passages with Pimen and with Missail and Varlaam. Thereafter, in the original libretto, Dmitri becomes an emblem of fate—not a man. His significance is then not unlike that of the Woman of Arles in Daudet's "L'Arlesienne."

The reason for the later change of scenes in Moussorgsky's second version—i. e., the substitution of the Kromy for the St. Basil scene—is obvious. The Kromy scene, after various protracted situations between individuals, again shows us the Russian people, who are the most powerful agents of the whole drama, in new surroundings and in an unprecedented mood, while the scene before the St. Basil Cathedral has been somewhat anticipated by the first scene of the prologue, before the walls of the Novodidievichy monastry. The St. Basil scene has certain similarity with the previous matter, and without a mob scene leaves the last act minus the violent exhibition of popular feeling which Moussorgsky, as he considered his subject, more and more desired. Mr. Stokowski—we think very wisely—refused to sacrifice either of these scenes, whereby his last act had three episodes, in order, those of St. Basil, of Kromy and of the Death of Boris.

That is good Moussorgsky, good opera, good theatre, while the Polish scenes fulfill none of these purposes, and distinctly thwart the momentum and the proportions of the drama. Why must they be included? Why did even Mr. Stokowski, having gone so far toward giving us the unadulterated "Boris," include them? The triumphant answer of the hard-shelled opera-producer, whose face says "I told you so," is merely the reiteration of the age-old belief that opera audiences will insist upon "love interest" and passages of Italianate melody, whether or not it is germane to the drama. Some day they will be proved wrong, for "Boris" as Moussorgsky planned it is a compact and thrilling drama, with movement and climax, and plenty of contrast provided by the big choral passages, and the inn scene for some humorous relief from a tragedy as grim and seizing as "Macbeth." The work should be heard in some such form as this in New York.

IN view of the evidence of the published libretto and score, to say nothing of recent presentations in Russia and America, it is hard to see how any one who believes in the opera at all can regard with indifference the misrepresentative productions of "Boris Godunoff" with which we have had to be content in the past. Not only music but essential drama has heretofore been kept from us; and it is no wonder, under the circumstances, that the opera has appeared episodic, disproportionate and fragmentary. There has been lacking the conclusion of the first scene where the peasants depart, grumbling at the orders received to appear on the morrow and salute Boris at the Kremlin; Pimen's narrative of the murder of Dmitri at the beginning of the first act, which is badly needed, as the strangely omitted climax of a scene which especially needs this excitement and acceleration; and the St. Basil scene, which is the essence of Moussorgsky, and provides an otherwise missing link in the dramatic narrative.

When the Kromy scene is used, which is advisable, the episode before St. Basil's bridges the gap between Dmitri's flight over the Lithuanian border and his appearance at the head of the hosts that advance against Moscow. If the Kromy scene is not used, the St. Basil scene is just as necessary and just as useful to give the story continuity and connect the actions of Boris in the Kremlin and Boris confronted by death. The St. Basil scene, moreover, is the original and the right setting of the strange and haunting prophecy of the Simpleton.

Regardless of the question of Rimsky-Korsakoff's revisions, a "Boris" with these principal restorations and with the extraneous Polish scenes eliminated would obviously be a different opera from the one we have known, and a far more effective and concise drama. It would be shortened as well as improved in theatrical effect. Some day this will be done by a fearless and enterprising manager, and then, the bugaboos of the tenor aria and the love duet having been dispersed, less curious and courageous souls will follow suit. Meanwhile Moussorgsky must wait a little longer to receive his due.

As for the changes that Rimsky-Korsakoff made in the music, they are not less numerous but more numerous than the writings of Godet and company would lead one to believe. The changes could be specified almost page by page, and range from insignificant and finical alterations to sweeping and drastic "corrections"—chastenings—of Moussorgsky's muse. Only the final scene of Boris's death is left nearly in its original form. As for the orchestrations, there are not two different orchestrations of "Boris"; there are two different scores, of which Rimsky's is by far the best, even if it is the more conventional, and the less in consonance with Moussorgsky's musical sense and his musico-dramatic ideals. How much could Moussorgsky, as his life and musical career had been, know of orchestrations? Obviously, very little. A conservatory graduate would turn out a more workmanlike job with the instruments. But he would not be Moussorgsky. Moussorgsky was seeking a technic, a style, a system of orchestral color which did not exist. Rimsky-Korsakoff's did not find for Moussorgsky what the latter was seeking, but he provided a rich, brilliant, colorful and almost foolproof partition, certain to sound and carry in the theatre. This is not to be minimized, nor can all the Moussorgsky apologists in the world explain and justify his prevailingly thin, stringy and monotonously colored instrumentation. He was a composer of revolutionary genius who did not know how to orchestrate. The matter is as simple as that. It is easy to explain that Moussorgsky did not want brilliant and conventional operatic effects, but modern, intimate, continent instrumentation. That may well be true, but it does not cover the case. Where Moussorgsky does score exceedingly well is when he writes for chorus, and here, in the wild chorus of the Kromy scene, Rimsky-Korsakoff should have let him alone. It is to be seen that, as regards music, or at least instrumentation, a compromise must be made between Moussorgsky and Rimsky-Korsakoff if Moussorgsky is to be given representation even approximate to his original ideas. And the true "Boris" yet to be given on any stage!

THOSE who complain of the length of "Boris" when both the first and second versions of Moussorgsky are performed should bear in mind two things. The first is that with everything included the opera is not as long as "Tristan" or Götterdämmerung" or "Meistersinger." The second is that with the Polish scenes dismissed the opera lasts as long as an average "Faust," "Carmen" or any other popular item of the repertory.

When Mr. Stokowski produced "Boris" at his Friday afternoon concert, tea and dinner engagements caused a large portion of his audience to leave. At the Saturday night performance, attended by this writer, there were very few departures before the end of the concert, which was at midnight. The audience applauded and cheered. A critical review of the technical qualities of this performance, already reported in the daily press, would be out of place here, but a word should be said for the prevailing excellence of its enunciation of a rather poor English translation by a cast which included the Boris of Mr. Baklanoff, the Marina of Miss Braslau, the Schouisky of Richard Crooks, and for the uncommonly capable treatment of minor parts, many taken by pupils of the Curtis Institute of Music, and the brilliant and dramatic singing, especially of the Kromy scene, by the chorus. Among the finest interpretations of the evening were Herbert Gould's Pimen and Albert Mahler's Simpleton. Mr. Stokowski was, of course, the directing spirit of all this, with his fundamentally dramatic temperament and his characteristic command of his forces. To him, as interpreter and director of a historic occasion, all thanks and honors are due.

BOOKS FOR MUSIC STUDENTS.

"The Violin Concerto," by Frederic B. Emery, is announced by the Violin Literature Publishing Company, 331 West Ohio Street, Chicago, as covering 3,300 concertos by a thousand composers in 300 years.

Giovanni Battista Lamperti—Lamperti "the younger," who was teacher of Sembrich, Hastreiter, Edyth Walker and others—will be the subject of William Earl Brown's "Vocal Wisdom," to be issued here under the auspices of the Singing and Playing Magazine.

Ditson's "Analytic Symphony Series," arranged for students in two-hand piano version, has been extended to eighteen titles, two recent issues being Tchaikovsky's Fourth symphony, with its "pizzicato ostinato," as fresh today as in 1890, and Mozart's melodius E flat major symphony, numbered 47 among the classic master's forty-nine and produced by the New York Philharmonic in 1847.

"Masters of the Symphony," by Dr. Percy Goetschius, published this season from the Boston house of Oliver Ditson Company, is the fifth year's continuation of a study course in "music understanding" adopted by the National Federation of Music Clubs.

Two dozen "Chansons Canadiennes" collected from Quebec folksingers by Marius Barbeau and harmonized by Healey Willan, are issued by the Frederic Harris Company in Great Britain and Canada and are available here through the Boston Music Company. Permission for public performance of the songs is granted upon "due acknowledgment of the arranger's name." There are parallel English texts by Paul England. One of the most familiar is "D'ou Viens-tu, Bergére?" of the shepherds of Bethlehem.

HOLLAND'S LYRIC ART

Dutch Composers of the Day Whose Works Gain Orchestral Hearing Oversea

By A. de WOL.

NO wonder that in so musically productive a country as Holland, with its animated concert life, its fine orchestras, its societies for chamber music and choir, so much music is being composed. As a matter of course there is much chaff to be found among the wheat, much "nur für den Augenblick geboren," as Goethe says, the same as anywhere else. Was it not the opinion of our great Lodewijk van Deyssel, one of the predecessors in the literary movement around 1880, that it was excessive ambition to write for more than two generations of readers?

But, as everywhere else in the wide world, the desire to compose is great enough, greater than the interest displayed by the public.

Different tendencies and influences are to be reckoned with. Musical Holland never possessed eminent creative powers of the first degree, mighty individuals of radiating influence such as a Vincent van Gogh and a Thijs Maris of the later Dutch pictorial art, or a Cuypers or Berlage in architecture. Nevertheless, it has significant accomplishments to its credit.

In a brief synopsis of the foremost Dutch composers since 1900 a careful sifting is necessary. There are three older ones who still form the base of musical Holland. These spiritual mentors are Bernard Zweers (1854-1924), Johan Wagenaar (1862—) and Alphons Diepenbrock (1862-1921).

Bernard Zweers of Amsterdam was a personality of the true Holland stamp. His music has sincerity and fervor, strength of heart, a sense of humor, constructive power and harmonic predilection for chromatics. He had a wonderful knowledge of orchestral color and a special sense of the value and the possibilities of the wood wind. His principal work, a Third symphony in B flat, entitled "Aan mijn Vaderland" (To My Fatherland), shows Holland around 1890 at its best. Considered for that time it is an achievement reflecting much of the Dutch nature—a kind of romantic and Wagnerian nature with the weakness and broadness of a Niels Gade.

Johan Wagenaar, now director of the Royal Conservatory at The Hague, is the Nestor of Dutch composers. He might be called the Dutch "Père Franck." In his previous place of residence, Utrecht, the geographic centre of the Netherlands, Wagenaar had a great number of talented young composers as pupils, and from that fact is derived the expression "the Utrecht School." Wagenaar's creative dream flowed abundantly. His Muse leans toward Berlioz and Strauss. A man of temperament and melody, he made contributions to almost every form of Dutch music. The overture, "Cyrano de Bergerac," is one of the many orchestral pieces of Wagenaar which have been performed in a foreign country. He has written several compositions which deserve the same fate: the symphonic poem "Saul and David" (inspired by Rembrandt's famous painting), his Shakespeare inspirations: the "King John" overture, the overture "The Taming of the Shrew," a funeral march, a symphonietta (dedicated to the Senate of the University of Utrecht in acknowledgment of the degree of doctor honoris causa), a romantic intermezzo and a subtle and exquisite piece of recent date, "Intermezzo Pastorale."

Alphons Diepenbrock has exercised a strong influence on another circle of Holland's young composers. An aristocratic artist, of a clear and deeply sensed classical erudition, he brought to a higher level the neo-Catholic church music. His majestic and mystically rich "Te Deum Laudamus" (for soloists, double-mixed choir and orchestra) is one of the few Te Deums which will stand by the side of Anton Bruckner's masterpiece.

Of the creative talents of the present generation let us first consider the orchestral composers. Three excellent Dutch orchestras (not counting the smaller ones at Arnhem, Groningen, Leeuwarden) are waiting most temptingly for them: in the first place, the Amsterdam Orkestgebouw Orchestra, widely known and appreciated throughout Europe; in the second place, the much younger Residentie Orchestra at The Hague, but by no means less productive, under the baton of Dr. Peter van Anrooy; third, the Utrecht Municipal Orchestra under the spirited leadership of the very progressive Evert Cornelis.

The older composers of this generation include Cornelis Dopper (1870-), assistant conductor of the Amsterdam Orchestra, whose compositions are more in favor with the management of the Concertgebouw than with the Dutch public and press. The composer's solidity and orchestral art surpass his creative talents, which are the opposite of originality and importance. This does not alter the fact that his "Ciaconna Gotica," his "Zuider Zee" symphony and his Sixth symphony, the so-called "Amsterdam symphony, are clever pieces, even if they do not represent Holland's music at its greatest. The Dutch character is too superficially implied.

We have in Gerard von Brücken Fock (1859-), notwithstanding his German name, a born Hollander (Middelburg on Walcheren Island in Zeeland), and in his music a sensitive, poetic impress of Wagner, later of Debussy and other French impressionists. He shows an individual spontaneity and power of observation in his orchestra suites, "Impressions du Midi." Von Brücken Fock is also a painter. Excellently written piano compositions and French songs with orchestra accompaniment are his best works. Peter van Anrooy (1879-), the present conductor of the Residentie Orchestra, is an eminent orchestra leader and educator, a true artist, averse to publicity, who has raised the musical life of The Hague to a high level. He has won popularity by his pretty and typically Dutch "Piet Hein Rhapsody," a fantasy for orchestra about a well-known Dutch popular song of the sea hero Piet Hein. It is short, vigorous, fluent and well orchestrated. Julius Röntgen (1855-), formerly director of the Amsterdam Conservatory, was born in Leipzig of Dutch parents, and, as a composer, is a noble, conservative Teutonic soul, who has cleverly and with much talent made experiments in Dutch folklore. His "Boertige Suite" for orchestra shows his talent well. A "Ballade über eine Norwegische Volksmelodie" for orchestra is a well-written, pleasing composition after an original and interesting Norwegian theme. A composer of talent is F. A. E. Koeberg (1870-), who lives in The Hague. He is a man of sincerity and simplicity, with a broad and in the right sense popular style with a fine sense of humor. Another young Hague composer is Leo Ruygrok, one of Wagenaar's best pupils and assistant conductor of the Residentie Orchestra. His eclectic musical nature, related to Tchaikovsky, Mahler and Strauss, expresses itself with good taste and a love for rich sound, as in his symphony and an overture "Midas." In Rotterdam there lives and works William Landré (1874-), an impressionist, whose "Nocturne" is considered a little jewel of Dutch musical literature.

The former Utrecht conductor Jan van Gilse (1881) has written compositions for orchestra and for choir after the models of Strauss and Mahler. A clever and effective work for orchestra is his Variations, patterned on a popular Dutch Santa Claus song.

A small coterie in Amsterdam expects much of Willem Pijper (1894), a composer of the extreme Left, who is strongly individualistic. His music is of a markedly cerebral quality. Whether the future will show that his admirers are right, and whether his solitude is an indication of genius, we have as yet no means of knowing. For the time being, however, the number of his congenial followers in Holland is very small.

In Utrecht there works another pupil of Wagenaar, Emile Enthoven, who has not yet found his musical self. But a Burlesque of Orchestra shows promise. Rudolf Mengelberg (1892) of Amsterdam, a cousin of the great conductor, is a composer whose work has also been played in America. Van Goudoever (1898) was for some time one of the best 'cello players in the Amsterdam Orchestra and is a pupil of Wagenaar. He has written a suite for 'cello with orchestra accompaniment, a "Danse Impressie" and an orchestral poem, "La Fête Bleue." Van Goudoever's fine and rhythmic talent has many admirers. At present he is the conductor of a theatre in Königsberg, Germany. A young native of Rotterdam, now living in The Hague, Alex Voormolen (1895), has not yet attempted much in the realm of symphony. A "Sinfonietta" and an overture "Baron Hop" (Baron Hop was a famous diplomat at The Hague in 1744 who invented the well-known confection "Haagsche Hopjes") show both French and German influences. His talent is in the main directed to the smaller forms of composition.

The same is true of Holland's best piano virtuoso, Dirk Schäfer (1874), whose "Rhapsodie Javanaise" and "Suite Pastorale," both for orchestra, are well-sounding pieces; they have fine characteristics, as well as some of the weaknesses, of youth. But it is Schäfer's works for piano, his songs and his piano quintet that reveal him as a creative musician. The scherzo "Hei 't was in de Mei" of Willem Andriessen for orchestra, is an unvarnished young work, fresh as Spring and typically Dutch. His concerto for piano in D flat and a missa for orchestra, choir and solos, are examples of his clear lyrical talent. Andriessen, a pupil of Zweers, is a renowned piano soloist. His brother, the Haarlem musician, Hendrik Andriessen (1879), also a pupil of Zweers, is of quite another spirit. The mystical neo-catholicism of Diepenbrock and the modern Schola Cantorum with spiritual affinity of Debussy and Caplet embody his musical canons.

The eighteenth annual appeal for the Hundred Neediest Cases is made today.

OPINIONS OF MUSICAL READERS

To the Editor of The New York Times:

PERHAPS a thought or two from one who views at a distance all this agitation about late comers at concerts may have some interest. Real hardships have resulted in some cases, but it seems to me the blame for this is put in the wrong place. It is attributed to the unreasonable arrogance of conductors. But the primary cause is the past unreasonable arrogance of audiences which felt no obligation to be on time or any sufficient sense of reverence for the real thing that a concert is for.

Being on time always has its inconveniences. Missing of ferryboats, trains or steamships to Europe is attended by annoyances and at times even with suffering, but no one thinks of blaming the management for this. We realize that the importance of the central object outweighs the personal mishaps, and these mishaps are reduced to a minimum by the general understanding that no exceptions to the rule will be made.

The custom of carelessness about concerts has been of so long life that it will seem absurd to make this comparison. Yet I think it may be useful to make it. Let those who are so ready to attribute their annoyance to the sense of self-importance on the part of a conductor stop to reflect a bit and give the conductor the benefit of at least a doubt. May not the conductor's action arise rather from his sense of the music's importance? And may not their own attitude come from a sense of the importance of their own convenience as being greater than that of the importance of any possible music?

From a distance of several hundred miles it seems to me that there is an excessive readiness to find fault with conductors, particularly with those who take an intense interest in their music and receive the greatest praise from the critics. Any sign of nervous annoyance is quickly pounced upon as an evidence of a "prima donna" temperamental spirit. Quick as a flash pens or typewriters are ready to point out the great salaries these conductors receive and the need of reducing their prosperity by refusals to attend concerts in which the importance of music is so much overrated.

This complaint about large salaries is ridiculous to any one who considers the enormous learning and nervous energy, as well as the rarity of genius, that must go into the making of an able conductor of an orchestra. That soloists of not one-tenth the merit of such a conductor get ten times as much income is taken as in the nature of things. That conductors' incomes are trifling as compared with those of many men in other walks of life who have little either of brains or taste is also a matter of course.

In short, it is all pretty much a question of putting music value above or below other value. Perhaps it is presumpuous to assert that music has value. But one might think an orchestra conductor excusable for entertaining the illusion that in a concert hall, at least, it is the supreme thing.

AN INDIANA ONLOOKER.

IS AMERICA A MUSICAL NATION?

To the Editor of The New York Times:

UNDER the above caption I offer the following, hoping that it may be worth publishing in the columns of the Sunday edition of THE TIMES. Your present writer is totally blind—has been all his life—but shrewdly observant of all that is good in music.

The story of the development of music as an art is too well known to need repetition here. Suffice it to say that, in my opinion, America, youngest and among the greatest of the nations of the earth, has endeavored to keep step with the rest of the world in its musical growth. We possess our own folk-music; but we likewise possess a wealth of originality in the field of serious composition.

Yet, despite all this, the writer notes with regret that during the present season not one of the programs of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Society's Sunday afternoon concerts has contained what can be called strictly American music. We hear Beethoven, Brahms, Berlioz, Franck, Respighi, Mozart, Handel, Rossini, in fact, practically all of musical Europe has been represented this season on American programs.

True enough, we hear much of Gershwin's "American in Paris" now and then; of Aaron Copland's concerto for piano and orchestra less frequently; but have we had the pleasure of hearing any of Henry Hadley, David Stanley Smith, George Whitfield Chadwick, or the later John Alden Carpenter, Roger Sessions and other composers who are really writing serious music?

I sincerely think we should have more American music on our symphony programs. We should hear more of American artists. In short, our conductors of symphony orchestras must bring America to her senses. It is, I believe, up to them.

JOHN J. DUFFY.

FOR A LIBERAL TASTE.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

THE present controversy over the respective merits of classic and modern music and the adaptability of each type to concert programs seems to me to be quite futile. An appreciation of the music of Bach is not diametrically opposed to an understanding of the creations of Pizzetti. Good taste is never clouded by prejudice; to oppose one school of music to another is to betray a lack of musical poise. So many words have already been wasted upon this mistaken conflict that it is by this time quite useless to reopen a discussion which was originally founded upon distorted viewpoints. An outstanding classic work does not have to entrench itself against the onslaught of modernism in order to retain its greatness. Likewise, a recent work does not have to push all of the classic masters from their time-worn pedestals in order to make its virtues apparent.

The concertgoer who allows his emotions to play havoc with him during the performance of a number which displeases him is, in reality, lacking in that delicate quality which so often distinguishes the genuine amateur from the bourgeois gentilhomme. These last words may have a snobbish ring to them, but they are none the less true. The true lover of music will conscientiously separate the wheat from the chaff, patiently discarding what he cannot use. That is the true mark of the musician—tolerance. ROBERT J. COHN Jr.

ASKS FOR SOLOISTS.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

AS one that for a number of years enjoyed the splendid symphony concerts in our city of New York, I note with regret that since the amalgamation of the Symphony and Philharmonic Orchestras we are no longer able to hear any virtuoso soloist at the concerts, a practice that was always followed in former days by those orchestras during the concert season.

Was it on account of competition that such artists as Kreisler, Zimbalist, Hofmann and others were engaged and one was able to hear the concertos of Beethoven, Brahms and Schumann performed with the orchestras, and all this for a moderate price, while now even general admission tickets are doubled and one very seldom has an opportunity of securing seats at all?

It is indeed a great pity that in such a great music centre as New York we are to be at the mercy of one orchestra, and the management being so sure of its success—as it is always able to hang a sign out in front of the box office, "All tickets sold"—that they no longer have to reckon with the public who are attending these concerts and will do as they please in saving all they can that was formerly spent for soloists. It has always been said that material success will do a great injury to art; and, with all due respect to the great maestro, Arturo Toscanini, I believe that the music-loving public had better artistic programs and more opportunity to enjoy these concerts formerly, and no doubt regret—as I do—the amalgamation of the former two orchestras into one.

CONDUCTORS' PROGRAMS.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

SPEAKING as one who has had to do with symphony orchestras a great many years, I can truthfully testify that in the question of program making the conductor's life is not a happy one. He is continually 'twixt devil and deep sea. He is damned if he does and is damned if he doesn't, and is deserving of much sympathy.

I read with much interest Mr. Stokowski's remarks to his audience in Carnegie Hall; also the very interesting letter of Mr. Gabrilowitsch recently printed in THE TIMES. Both artists have my sympathy, but I cannot follow Mr. Stokowski all of the way and I can go with Mr. Gabrilowitsch only a very short distance.

I think we must take it for granted that the audiences which attend symphony concerts in New York, Boston, Philadelphia and Chicago should by this time be fairly well sophisticated, whatever may be said of other cities which have orchestras. I think it quite the duty of the conductors of those great orchestras to present modern music even if it does hurt the present-day ear and may not be the stuff from which immortality springs. And if some of the audience choose to express their disapproval by hissing, what harm is done? On the contrary, such demonstrations quicken the interest in the music itself and probably hasten the final verdict, for or against, the work in question.

There is one more point I wish to make. On a recent Sunday Mr. Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra broadcast among other things Stravinsky's "Le sacre du printemps." That, to my mind, was a most serious error. On that day undoubtedly millions of persons from one end of the country to the other listened in on the broadcasting by one of the country's greatest orchestras under one of its most famous conductors. I'll venture to say that 90 per cent of these listeners had never heard a symphony orchestra, and, moreover, were prejudiced against "classical" or "high-brow" music.

What must have been their reaction to "Le sacre du printemps," which is a hard nut to crack even for the seasoned concertgoer? I fear a large part of those listeners tuned in on the nearest jazz band long before the piece was finished.

"DIE FLEDERMAUS."

To the Editor of The New York Times:

TIME and change have wrought a veritable metamorphosis since 1875 in the manner of composing light music, but the wheel turns, and in its revolutions seems to be coming around to those delightful halcyon days again. I was a lad of 22 when Jacques Offenbach, Karl Millöcker and Johann Strauss were at the very pinnacle of their glory. Offenbach I never met, but Millöcker and Strauss were friends whom it was a delight to know. Not rich, as our modern smash-hit writers are, they reaped only laurels and a modicum of wealth.

All these memories were brought forcibly to my mind the other day when I witnessed the local revival of Johann Strauss's "Die Fledermaus," which has been renamed "A Wonderful Night." By a curious round of circumstances it was the first time I had the pleasure of seeing it since the world première at the Theater an der Wien in Vienna, April 5, 1874, on which momentous occasion I was present. Then it brought to the world the waltz, a comparatively new form of music, which soon became the most popular melodic idiom everywhere. "Die Fledermaus" ran a year in Berlin, three months in Munich (an unheard-of engagement for that small but delightful city), and established long records in other places.

As we neared the end of the century, Lehar, Oscar Straus and equally facile composers came to the fore. But, like everything else, a new taste developed, bringing with it a new group of writers. The two-step was soon crowned king, and the old king was apparently dead. From the two-step was evolved the present-day jazz. The waltz, however, did not fade away entirely, like the polka, but always remained with us, though it must be admitted it has been very much in the background. Then, presto! a mysterious, magic force touched it and brought it right back among us again. Victor Herbert suddenly becomes the new rage, Johann Strauss is reproduced with all the splendor of a gorgeous production and a revolving stage.

Now that "Die Fledermaus" has proved its timelessness, I look hopefully forward to a new régime of waltz kings, to men like Jerome Kern and George Gershwin, who will apply their talent to this charming métier and give 77-year-old music lovers like myself, as well as the new generation, an additional thrill.

RECALLING THE GARCIAS.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

THE current revival of "Don Giovanni" prompts me to submit the following: So far as is known to me, I hold the singular disinction of being the only person in America to have held the original score of "Don Giovanni" in my hands.

At that time, as Katharine Evans, I was studying under Pauline Viardot-Garcia in Paris, and remember with great pride the day when my beloved maitresse, in going over the special cabinet in which the score was kept, brought it forth for me to examine—with all the composer's markings.

Pauline Viardot seldom produced it for public scrutiny, and, after her death, her will provided for the giving of this valued possession to the Paris Conservatoire, where she had taught for many years.

I have often heard from her of the first performance here in America, when her father, Manuel Garcia, and her elder sister, Mme. Malibran, sang the principal rôles, and I take great pride in thus being linked with this epoch of famous singers in this great world of music.

AS TO GERMAN SINGERS.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

IT is a well-known fact that we never appreciate what we have when we have it. After the wretched performance of "Walküre," given last Saturday at the Metropolitan, the public is now beginning to realize the value of Mmes. Kappel and Easton. The latter will not appear at all this season. A thoroughly commendable if not brilliant artist, she has left a gap in the early season repertory which cannot easily be filled. Only now, when the rôle is taken by a lesser artist, may we see the splendor of her conception of the Princess Werdenberg. Her Sieglinde was unsurpassable, and her Brünnhilde, if not a revelation, was a relief from the shrieks of the contralto brigade.

Mme. Kappel is an artist whose worth has never fully been realized. Naturally, a woman mature enough to sing all of the great Wagnerian rôles is not supposed to have a figure like Gilda Gray's. Nevertheless, Mme. Kappel is the possessor of a commanding stage presence. Her Kundry suffers slightly from her lack of suppleness, but her marvelous voice more than makes up for this small defect. It is not often that one is able to hear in any opera house as fine a performance of the rôle of Isolde as Mme. Kappel gives. Although her portrayal of Brünnhilde is just a trifle less great, her rendition of the "Ho, yo, to ho!" is superb. Her Ortrud, which she has done here only once, is one of the most marvelously sinister pieces of work yet done on the operatic stage, and her performance of the second act invocation is positively thrilling. Yet this great artist, probably because she does not make a specialty of falling whenever the opportunity presents itself, has not quite "caught on" with the press and the public.

NEWS OF VARIOUS ORCHESTRAS

Pizzetti to Attend Philharmonic Concert Here—Gabrilowitsch As Soloist—Other Music

WHEN Ildebrando Pizzetti comes to this country for the first time, as announced, for a short concert and lecture tour between Feb 25 and March 20 next, the Italian composer will sail on the same boat with Mr. and Mrs. Toscanini and will be present on the evening of Feb. 27, at Carnegie Hall, when the Philharmonic-Symphony gives a world première of his latest composition, "Rondo Veneziano."

Pizzetti was born Sept. 20, 1880, in Parma, the son of musical parents, and was a pupil of the Parma Conservatory, where his first work, "Extase," was performed. In 1908 he was substitute conductor for Campanini, and the following year went to Florence as professor of counterpoint and harmony at the Musical Institute, of which he became director in 1918. He led a concert of his works in Rome.

With Giannotto Bastianelli he founded at Florence in 1914 the magazine "Dissonanza" as the mouthpiece of contemporary Italian music. In 1924 he became director of the Milan Conservatory.

Among his operas are "Fedra" (1915), "Debora e Jaele" (1922), "Fra Gherardo," heard in America, and "Lo Straniero." Other works include music for the Verdi Centenary and for a D'Annunzio photoplay, some church music, and a sonata for violin and piano.

Several of the late Gustav Mahler's songs, with Mme. Matzenauer as soloist, will be heard at this afternoon's concert of the Friends of Music at Mecca Temple.

Ossip Gabrilowitsch will play Mozart's second concerto on Tuesday with the Detroit Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, yielding the baton during that number to Victor Kolar.

Rudolph Ganz, former conductor of the St. Louis Symphony, is announced as piano soloist with the Manhattan Symphony Orchestra on Jan. 5 in Tchaikovsky's concerto.

Glazunoff's Sixth symphony is to be repeated at a concert of the Conductorless Symphony Orchestra on Jan. 4, with Aubert's "Habanera" and "The Enchanted Isle" by Salzedo.

CHORAL EVENTS.

The Mount Holyoke College Carol Choir is to sing its annual Christmas program here at the Town Hall on Friday, Dec. 20, following presentations of the music both at Holyoke, Mass., and in the college hall at South Hadley. Composers in Dr. Hammond's list include Percy Fletcher, David Stanley Smith, Clarence Dickinson, Frederick Erickson, Harvey Gaul, John J. Bishop, Vaughan Williams and Gevaert. The women collegians are also to appear Dec. 21 in the chapel at Princeton University.

Pietro Yon, organist of St. Patrick's, will appear this afternoon in an organ recital at St. Michael's Church in Paterson, with vocal soloists from the cathedral, including P. Barchi, W. Sheehan, L. de Hierapolis and Carl Schlegel.

Walter Henry Hall conducts the Columbia Chorus in the university chapel at 4 o'clock this afternoon in Horatio Parker's "The Dream of Mary." The words of the angel will be spoken by Sydney Thompson.

NOTES OF OPERA FOLK.

THE Russian Opera Company, recently at the Champs-Elysées in Paris is to appear at the National Theatre in Havana from Jan. 1 to 15. The Cuban Government has sponsored the engagement to attract American tourists, and the Cunard Line has announced four sailings from New York in the time the Russians will sing in Havana.

"The Grand Duchess," by Jacques Offenbach, will be presented in New York for the first time in several decades when the Little Theatre Opera Company brings it to the Heckscher Theatre on Monday evening, Dec. 16, for a week's run.

The first matinee of "Don Giovanni" at the Metropolitan will be given for the benefit of the Florence Crittenton League on Thursday, Dec. 12.

Marion Bauer has written incidental music for "Prometheus Bound" at the Booth Theatre next Sunday, with Richard Hale in the title rôle. The Greek tragedy is presented by the honorary classical society of the Washington Square College of New York University.

The Graduate School of the Juilliard Musical Foundation, with both orchestra and stage management as well as singers from the personnel of the school, will present "Hansel and Gretel" for three performances during Christmas week at the Heckscher Theatre.

Charlotte Lund is to continue last season's successful "operas for children," with morning performances of "Hansel and Gretel" on Dec. 27 and 31 next at the Town Hall. American artists in the cast will include Madge Cowden, Louise Bernhardt, Helene Troisaas, Wellington Smith and Aleta Dore, the dancer, who will act the Witch.

Johanna Gadski is due from Berlin in mid-December by the Leviathan, to be followed a week later by other returning singers of the German Grand Opera Company aboard the President Roosevelt. The latter steamship will also bring new scenic, lighting and costume equipment purchased by S. Hurok to be used in the Wagnerian productions on a tour from Boston to Los Angeles and San Francisco.

A feature of the performance of "Cavalleria Rusticana" by the Philadelphia Grand Opera Company tomorrow evening at the Philadelphia Academy of Music will be the appearance of the Curtis Institute Orchestra, consisting of seventy members.

In the Philadelphia Civic Opera Company's performance of "Die Walküre" next Thursday evening in Philadelphia, Florence Austral will sing Brünnhilde, with Helen Stanley as Sieglinde, Fernanda Doria as Fricka, Paul Althouse as Siegmund, Georges Baklanoff as Wotan and Sigurd Nilssen as Hunding.

OTHERS TO BE HEARD.

Samuel Baldwin has a Wagner program at this afternoon's free organ recital at the College of the City of New York. On Wednesday's list are two chorale preludes of Bach and the andante cantabile of Tchaikovsky.

The Stradivarius Quartet tonight gives the second of six educational chamber concerts at the Neighborhood Playhouse in Grand Street, under the auspices of the Henry Street Settlement Music School.

J. Barrett Maus, Canadian baritone, sings at the Plaza small ballroom on Tuesday in an hour of music by Hasel Gruppe, piano; Camille Plasschaert, violin, and Paul Gruppe, 'cello.

The Apollo Club of Brooklyn opens its fifty-second season Tuesday evening at the Brooklyn Academy. Assisting are Flora Woodman, soprano, and Raoul Vidas, violin.

Abby Morrison Ricker, soprano, will appear Dec. 17 at the new Junior League Clubhouse, 221 East Seventy-first Street, assisted by Joseph Bobrobich, tenor, and Florence Lee.

VARIOUS MUSIC EVENTS.

The Y. M. and Y. W. Symphony Orchestra of Newark, conducted by Philip Gordon, will give a concert this evening at the Educational Alliance on East Broadway.

Agnes Robinson, Bernice Schalker, Dmitri Dobkin, Giuseppe Interrante and others give a benefit at the Brooklyn Academy tonight for the Asilo di Mendicita of Menfi, Sicily.

Aaron Copland speaks at the New School for Social Research Friday on "Forms of Modern Music in America."

Ada MacLeish, soprano, and Herbert Dittler, violin, will appear Friday afternoon at the New York Institute for the Blind.

Saturday morning musicales for young people are offered this season at the Neighborhood Club, 104 Clark Street, Brooklyn.

America's first "Sea-going Christmas Music Festival" is announced aboard the Canadian Pacific liner Duchess of Bedford, leaving here Dec. 23. Randolph Ross, heard in "Hugh the Drover" at Toronto, will direct the carols, while other ceremonies will be in charge of J. Harry Smith, who assisted in last year's Yuletide Festival at Victoria, B. C.

Harold Flammer has become vice president of G. Schirmer, Inc., in association with Carl Engel as president.

PLANS OF MUSICIANS.

Josef Hofmann, after playing a current benefit here, will give his first recital in Carnegie Hall on Sunday afternoon, Jan 12.

Harold Samuel is sailing for America soon, making his reappearance Jan. 2 and 3 at the Philharmonic concerts and Jan. 18 at the Town Hall.

Hermina Elsele Browne, soprano, assisted by Rudolph Fuchs, violin, has announced a concert Wednesday evening, Dec. 11, at the Newark Y. M. C. A., for the benefit of the New Fernwood Fresh Air Fund.

Varying the "artists' recitals" course of the People's Symphony Concerts on Dec. 20 at Washington Irving High School will be a special holiday program by the twenty singers in native costume who comprise the Russian Symphonic Choir.

The Flushing Oratorio Society, with Herbert S. Sammond as conductor, has engaged Lucia Chagnon, Jeanne de Nault, Robert Elwyn and Alexander Kisselburgh for "The Messiah" on Dec. 11. Mr. Kisselburgh is singing Handel's work with the New York Oratorio Society on Dec. 27 and Mr. Elwyn is also singing in the "Messiah" at White Plains. Fred Patton has been re-engaged for the same work in Windsor, Ont.

BOOKS ON MUSIC.

"English Diction," by Clara Kathleen Rogers, is issued by the Oliver Ditson Company as Part II of that singer's work, "The Voice and Speech," with many pages of well-made exercises for practicing vowel sounds and consonants, syllables and phrases, with pitfalls for the singer.

The Ditsons have also published three new volumes in the convenient Pocket Music Series, one a practical study of "Music in Worship," by Walter Samuel Swisher of Wellesley Hills, Mass., and two by Professor Leo Rich Lewis of Tufts College. Professor Lewis, in addition to his essay on "The Ambitious Listener," has also made into one handbook a miniature piano score of various little classics from Handel, Haydn, Beethoven, Mozart, Mendelssohn, Brahms and a dozen examples from Bach.

EUROPEAN MUSIC NOTES

SOME of the operas recently produced or scheduled for production some time during the season in Europe include: Honegger's "Judith" (Breslau); Karl Flick-Steger's "Dorian Gray" (Auszig); Alfano's "I'Ultimo Lord" (San Carlo Theatre, Naples); George Antheil's American opera "Transatlantic" (Frankfort Opera House, April, 1930); Braunfel's "Galathea," text by the composer (Cologne, March, 1930); Dressel's "Maria's Rose Bush" (Leipzig); Grosz's "Achtung, Aufnahme," book by Béla Balász, book by Arthur Zneininger (Frankfort); Ernst Krenek's "Life of Orestes" (Leipzig, Jan. 18, 1930); Milhaud's "Christopher Columbus," book by Paul Claudel (Staatsoper Unter den Linden, Berlin); Karol Rathaus's "Fremde Erde," book by K. Palffy-Waniek; Alexander Tcherepnin's "Die Hochzeit der Sobeide," book by Hugo von Hoffmannsthal; Kurt Weill's "The Rise and Fall of the City Mahagonny" (New Theatre, Leipzig, March 9, 1930); Eugen Zador's "Xmal Rembrandt," one-act opera, book by K. Palffy-Waniek (Breslau, February, 1930); Schönberg's "D'Aujourd'hui Demain" (Breslau Municipal Theatre).

The Vienna Opera plans to present a number of short one-act operas. Franz Schrecker has just completed a new opera, "Christophorus," for which many leading stages are bidding for the rights of first production. Mark Lothar, composer of "Tyll," is working on an opera-bouffe, "Lord Spleen," the text by Hugo F. Königsgarten. The opera is planned as a contrasting composition for an evening's program with the completed one-act "Ninon," based on Ernst Gardt.

Berlin and Viennese music-lovers are quite upset over recently printed interviews with the tenor Michael Bohnen, formerly of the Metropolitan Opera Company and now singing in the operetta "Marietta" in Berlin. Some of his reflections which aroused the ire of the critics follow:

"I have done Hans Sachs 160 times. I am weary. I can work now only for the present—not for Beethoven and Wagner, who are Michelangelos. A bit of rest, a bit of singing in operetta, a bit of Marietta."

Bohnen's lèse-majesté regarding Wagner especially have aroused counter-attacks, ranging from irony to bitter censure.

Says Bohnen: "Wagner's music is endurable in the concert halls only by dint of necessity. But whom will the works interest ten years from now? The day is coming eventually when people will see through them * * * unmask them * * * realize, discover how laughable Wagner's world is, how laughable it is to dangle sauerkraut from one's chin every evening, a curl over one's eye, a blue cloak over one's shoulders and to represent something which the slave-owner of singers and lovers of music, Richard Wagner, wished to force upon posterity unconditionally." The critic from whose article this quotation is taken closes with an almost lacrimose appeal to all decent music-lovers to ignore such idoloclastic profanation.

The following excerpt from an article by a critic of the Berlin Lokal-Anzeiger is among the more restrained:

"Silly interviews are nothing unusual in our present-day advertising world, and one does not have to be a real Hollywood business man to get a chance to give such. It does not matter whether the subject under discussion is Emil Jannings's cook or Michael Bohnen's views on art. The principal subject is that there should be something to talk about.

"Nevertheless, a man who once had the stuff of which great artists are made, and still has a reputation to lose, ought to guard his teeth against such utterances. What does Michael Bohnen, over whose Hans Sachs so many have been enthusiastic, mean by spreading such rot about Wagner, on whose sun-chariot he has sailed to the limelight of world-fame? Comment is gratuitous, since it leads but to recrimination. Now the pity is that one will be able to think of Bohnen only to recall the penetrating odor of sauerkraut. And for this the beautiful women of the stalls, on whose approbation so much depends, will not forgive him so easily."

Ivor Novello, the English actor and composer, has written a comedy, "Symphony in Two Flats." The plot concerns the hopes of a poor but honest young composer, David Kennard, who has set his heart on winning a £2,000 prize offered by a gramaphone company for a new symphony. He is blind and does not win the prize. The acting of the author received more attention from the critics than the "comedy."

"La Fugue" is the name of a new three-act French comedy by M. Henri Duvernois. Evidently ideas concerning the figurative humor of fugues are not the same in various countries, especially among students who have battled with its intricacies.

"Darling Papa, in a Thousand Notes" is the title of a new German operetta. Obviously two sorts of notes are referred to.

The eighteenth annual appeal for the Hundred Neediest Cases is made today.

ART CURRENT IN THE NEW YORK GALLERIES

CONTEMPORARY PAINTING

Gallery of Living Art Exhibits Work Uptown—British Art of Our Day Also Shown

By ELISABETH LUTHER CARY.

THE expression "contemporary" seems no less open to the charge of ambiguousness than the title "American" in speaking of art today. There hardly can be a time when more races shall unite in producing American art and surely the contemporary range carries us far beyond any one classification, formula or system.

Nevertheless, when we visit such an exhibition as that at the Brummer Gallery, which comes from the New York University Gallery of Living Art, the one certainty that makes its way to the front of the mind is that the collection shown is rightly entitled "Contemporary Paintings." Practically nothing is included that could have been found among the works of an earlier period.

To discover a group of characteristics, or even one characteristic, that might serve to bind the various works into some sort of relation would be interesting, and might be got at by persistent investigation and eliminations, but this commentator has had no luck at all. The pictures insist upon being taken singly and not in battalions, and, unless this insistence is itself the tie that binds, we are as far as ever away from knowing why we know that they are all indubitably of our own time. Nor is this a plea for some one to tell us. A profound skepticism concerning what may or must be told about art gets in the way of such a wish.

The Brummer Gallery is playing host to the exhibition because of the lack of space in the Washington Square gallery where the pictures, most of them, belong. Twenty-eight are recent acquisitions made by Mr. Gallatin for the Gallery of Living Art; the remaining works are lent by well-known collectors whose names appear in the catalogue. Among the twenty-eight are several in which we perceive, not ungratefully, a departure from the types representing the artists in most American collections. André Derain's portrait of Henri Matisse, for example, is a fine little appetizer with which to open an all-modern meal. Pablo Picasso's "Portrait of the Painter" would serve the same purpose, its scrupulous rendering of features far from ingratiating in itemized inspection balanced by the intensity of the interrogation in the eyes, and lifted into esthetic regions by the beauty of the color relations.

SINCE Vlaminck is represented by a "Banks of the Oise" in which his rich personality is under cover, it is forunate that Mr. Osborne lends "The Port" with its gulls flying on strong wings and its massed houses and sails with their curious look of lying in ambush waiting to attack. The morose beauty of the "Chapel in Brittany" with its dark pellucid sky, Man Ray's stubbornly marching troops, are others that play a brave part in giving emphasis to the group destined for the Gallery of Living Art, a group that is, perhaps inevitably, at a disadvantage in its juxtaposition with the generally more significant works from the private collections.

The range, however, fills in gaps that are better filled if we wish to contemplate the modern movement from a variety of angles. Max Jacob's "Orpheus Attacked by the Bandits" is hardly an important contribution, but it indicates a lapping over of literary predilections upon the modernist's vehement rejection of literary taint in art. Gaston Roux pastes birds and statues on his "Greek Composition" with so sophisticated a childishness that he almost tells thereby the story of a period. Joan Miro, effective in composition, says something of the caricatural temper that scuttles through much of modern work without aspiring toward the Daumier ideal. André Masson's "Italian Postcard" is framed by Pierre Legrain in wood with as many levels as a French hotel. The other artists whose work has been acquired by Mr. Gallatin are Fernand Leger, Paul Klee, Maurice Kantor, A. S. Baylinson, Henry Billings, Haim Soutine, Maurice Dufresne, Roger de La Fresnaye and Charles Lapique, also Matisse with three or four charming pencil drawings.

CONSPICUOUS among the paintings loaned are Joseph Stella's magnificent "Brooklyn Bridge" from Société Anonyme; Jean Lurçat's Egyptianesque portrait of Mrs. Dale and Modigliani's bland "Gypsy Woman and Baby," both from the Dale Collection; Georges Rouault's "Clown," devoid of sentiment, devoid of humor, the brute essence of clown, lent by Samuel A. Lewisohn; "Avenue du Bois de Boulogne" by Raoul Dufy, hanging near the Gromaire and throwing its sombre tonality into relief by the brightness of its glittering smile, from the collection of Mrs. Charles H. Russell Jr., and two fine examples of Demuth's water color, one an eggplant with tomatoes, painted in 1926, the other almost a decade earlier, a circus scene.

The "Eggplant and Tomatoes" with its fairly uncanny truth to color facts and facts of form might well raise the old question of whether yielding yourself completely to the objective appearance or transforming that appearance to conform to a creative idea of your own is the "better" art. If Mr. Demuth is the artist he at least can be trusted to yield himself, but that cannot be said of many. Both of these water colors come from the collection of Philip L. Goodwin. Miss Mary Hoyt Wiborg lends an excellent Leger which argues for the transformation of natural appearances and the Matisse still life, lent by Stephen C. Clark, hovers lightly betwixt and between.

A word must be given to the helpfulness of the hanging. The liberal and judicious space arrangement gives to each picture its due, making a visit to the gallery a serene pleasure whatever one's reaction to the individual items in the exhibition may be.

IT is a privilege too seldom enjoyed to find at the same time with the examples of French contemporary art now on view in the city a well-chosen exhibition of contemporary British art. At the galleries of Thomas Agnew & Sons we have a range that goes from Walter Sickert to Duncan Grant and includes admirable examples of Augustus John, Keith Baynes, Roger Fry, Mark Gertler, Sir William Orpen and P. Wilson Steer.

Augustus John, in addition to a group of striking but far from overwhelming portraits, is represented by two flower subjects which, so far as internal evidence may be trusted, belong to his latest work. If that is the case we may quote with infinite respect the old true tag, "the last is best of all the game." The lovely begonia of the large-blossom variety is one of the distinguished features of the whole collection. Not only the color and shape of blossom and leaf have been described with the accurate freedom of which John in his best moments is supremely master, but the spring and life of the plant are there. There is a touch of flattery in the portraiture of the flower-pot, but the begonia is truth itself, ranking with fruits and flowers of Demuth in characterization. And a touch of unmitigated John is seen in the newspapers on which the plant in its pot is placed.

Most space is given to Sickert, appropriately, Angus Davidson explains in the preface to the catalogue, "both because he is the most important living English painter and because, owing to his extraordinary versatility and variety of subject and treatment, it is necessary to see a variety of examples of his work to form any estimate of it as a whole." He is certainly various enough in the ten or eleven examples shown, yet from the beautiful "Dieppe Harbor," tranquility embodied, to the shrewd glancing portrait of Winston Churchill it would be quite unlikely that an attribution of any of the pictures to an artist other than Sickert should occur.

WILSON STEER'S "Poole Harbor" is the heir of Constable's genius for wet skies and a flat land; Sir William Orpen's "The Old Circus" tells a story, asks an explanation and entertains the eye, all in one breath; Roger Fry is in his best vein with the "Salle des Caryatides" of the Louvre, space leading into space and crossing half light to full light, to shadow, to half shadow. Mark Gertler is far from being at his best in his "Girl's Head," which reverts to a pre-Raphaelite mood without the pre-Raphaelite feeling for nature. In his still-life he is steeped in Renoir reds. Duncan Grant in three examples, a Venetian landscape, the study of an old woman and a still-life subject, shows a versatility unusual in his always interesting work. The "Old Woman" is his masterpiece, the patching of vigorous color matching the vigor of the expression on the shrewdest of aging physiognomies. Keith Baynes manages a difficult red with mastery. In this exhibition as in the one at Brummer's the excellent hanging is responsible for a considerable share of the effect, which has, however, no "gallery look," the pictures hanging as if at home in an English interior, surrounded by the color and tone of such an interior. As usual, we leave a collection of English paintings with the conviction that in no other nation has the contribution of color as against colors been quite so successful.

Katherine Drier, president of the Société Anonyme, will give a radio talk on "Trends in Modern Art" Friday, Dec. 13, at 5:15 o'clock (Station WEAF), under the auspices of the Women's City Club of New York.

RODIN IN PHILADELPHIA

Opening of the New Museum Devoted to His Sculpture—Comprehensive Collection

IN Philadelphia the new Rodin Museum has been dedicated, building and contents the gift of Jules E. Mastbaum. It is to be administered by the Pennsylvania Museum of Art, which, itself only a few years old, commands, not a great distance beyond, the head of the Parkway. The architects, Paul P. Cret of Philadelphia and Jacques Grébier of Paris, have furnished as a shrine for the Rodin collection a chaste French structure reared on lines of almost mausoleum austerity. Before it stretch formal French gardens and a pool (bleak enough in Winter!), and the gateway is a reconstruction of the eighteenth century château façade that was reassembled by Rodin on his Meudon Val Fleury estate after the original château near Issy had been torn down. Thus to make use of the façade in Philadelphia was a good idea; but in concrete realization it misses a little being as effective as the architects hoped, since, viewed from any angle save that directly in front, it establishes a sense of thin, shell-like incompletion that, due to its size, rather detracts from the beauty of the whole architectural scheme.

The Rodin collection is comprehensive enough to permit of the visitor's forming a general impression of the famous sculptor's art. It embodies his best and also his least convincing essays in plastic media. Rodin was always more or less torn between Phidias and Michelangelo. To begin with, his spiritual home was Greece, and to this predilection belong such well-known pieces as the "Age of Bronze." This was what he called the "four plane" technique, as contrasted with the "two plane" of Gothic sculpture. Most of Rodin's work was, as we know, in the direction of Michelangelo and the Gothics, though toward the end of his life he began to waver, expressing doubt as to his wisdom in swinging away from the antique ideal.

At his best Rodin is eloquent indeed, putting into plastic form esthetic theories that are strongly original and sound. Less easily defended must be expressions such as the "Man Holding an Angel on His Knee" or "The Triumph of Victor Hugo," in which baroque runs away with him and ends in froth. It would take an enthusiast also to champion many of the downright symbolic excursions. Rodin was always attempting to be a philosopher in stone and bronze, and too frequently the hard medium resisted his efforts. However, that he was a tremendous force, capable of high plastic expression, few will care to deny. And we may be forever grateful to him for helping to liberate modern sculpture from its chains of slavish imitation and dull mediocrity.

HERE AND THERE

MAURICE STERNE'S monument to "The Early Settlers of New England" was unveiled last Friday afternoon at Worcester, Mass. The spirit of these pioneers is embodied in the figures of a man and woman, surmounting a base upon whose sides some of the struggles of conquest in the wilderness are pictured.

Mortimer J. Fox is exhibiting his work at the Ferargil Galleries. His landscapes are scenes on the coast of California, in Maine, the Bahama Islands and the West Indies. Mr. Fox was an architect and banker some years ago, before he took up painting. His exhibition will be reviewed next Sunday.

Gabriel Garcia Maroto's drawing "The River" opens like a book. Some lines going in one direction and some almost at right angles come to a point at the frame of the picture. Though the line is hard and smooth, things ride into one another as in a dream. The land encroaches upon the water and the water ripples into the land. His painting, which in texture and color is like faded fresco, is less pure and hard, and less mysterious than the drawings. Mr. Maroto's work will be at the Delphic Studio until Dec. 14.

William Van Dresse is showing portrait charcoals at Miss Sparks's. The drawings happily can take the place of photographs. They are certainly more alive and can be reproduced to a small and practicable size.

Until Dec. 14 water-colors by Edwin Avery Park are on view in the S. P. R. Galleries, located in the penthouse of 40 East Forty-ninth Street. From Dec. 16 to Dec. 28 inclusive, sketches and lithographs by Richard Edes Harrison and decorative oils by Don Blanding and Earl Cohan will be shown there.

MURAL ART PICKS UP

Panels by Boardman Robinson, Done With Automobile Paint, Augur Well for Future

By EDWARD ALDEN JEWELL.

MURAL art in America seems to be picking up these days. Have we at length bade eternal farewell to the stilted, tedious investiture of a generation gone by? The wistful sprig of hope begins to put forth blossoms, or perhaps they are no more than buds as yet. But there's a stir in the air, and good things are surely on the way.

One mark of the new idea in American mural work is employment of something more substantial than windy abstractions. Enough of sterile symbols like Justice and Virtue and Truth! We need, for this age, more solid fare. What shall it be?

Well, commerce offers itself; not just the concept—embodied in some terrifyingly grandiose woman with flowing robes and a face so cold, so correct, so empty that it could not possibly launch one ship, let alone a thousand—but rather the lusty, naked, adventurous forces themselves of trade up and down the world.

We have had the graceful, pale, really exquisite recordings by Griffith Baily Coale on the walls of the new Lee, Higginson Building in Broad Street, delightfully filling the allotted spaces and only marred in their effect by the overdecorated columns of an otherwise imposing big banking room. Now we have before us (though unfortunately it is not to remain in this city) the commerce story related by Boardman Robinson for the Kaufmann department store in Pittsburgh. These murals, on canvas, are exhibited (until Dec. 14 only) at the Art Students League, and you will be missing a great deal if you fail to go and see them.

TEN murals constitute the series, and of these nine are finished. The enterprise is of ambitious scope. First comes the primitive bartering between Persians and Arabs; ships and camels their vehicles; silks, gold, spices, wines and precious stones their cargoes. Next the Carthaginians, "inheritors of the pioneering genius of the Phoenicians." Then the mercantile supremacy of the Venetians, followed by that of the Portuguese and in turn by that of the Dutch. England, with the thriving East India Company follows, and at length the scene shifts to the Western Hemisphere: the lucrative slave trade of the eighteenth century; the clipper ships of the first half of the nineteenth. In the last of the completed murals we find the toil of preceding centuries bursting into "frenzy and tumult." Man's impulse, to quote one of the notes in the catalogue, "has become vertical. Commerce strives to be free of the sea by turning to the sky"; and so "this mural is a symbolization of the welter of structural, industrial and commercial activities of the present day."

In the execution of this formidable task Mr. Robinson's power of illustration never loses its edge. It is one thing to take an elaborate historical theme; quite another to make it, throughout, vibrant with life. Archives, however ancient, have been asked to keep their dust at home. So the artist's vitalizing enthusiasm for man's labor, of whatever period, remote or close at hand, is never obscured. That is primarily why the murals are so excellent. Every episode glows with a life of its own, while slipping smoothly into the mosaic of the whole.

But this is not the sole excellence. The workmanship, spirit aside, is astonishingly sound. Each subject is a reasoned thesis on composition, though the beholder's interest in the craft of the artist never comes ahead of his interest in a well-told tale. The figures are admirably placed in their settings. Boardman Robinson is an architectural painter as well as an illustrator. He has proceeded with the obvious desire to fill every section of his large canvas with appropriate exposition, and possibly in this regard he has sometimes gone a little too far. Possibly it would have been preferable now and then to omit those fascinating cloud formations, letting activity in the foreground project itself against an unfurnished vault of blue. However, repeated visits might dispel this doubt from the reviewer's mind; and even so meticulously filled, the compositions do not appear cluttered.

Mr. Robinson used automobile paint! Why not? Certainly the experiment has turned out well, and if time fails to blacken these now bright and lively colors, such paint will probably enjoy no end of popularity. Of course, in using automobile paint you do not simply dip your brush in a can; the artist himself is responsible for those myriad tones, often so subtle. If motor people would go and look at the murals, they might get a good many hints about painting their cars.

Maybe some day, now that he has demonstrated his capacity for this sort of thing, Mr. Robinson will take up true fresco, which in oil he sometimes suggests quite startlingly. His friends Orozco and Rivera, the Mexicans, would be glad to have him join their company, and it would be a fine thing if we could see a revival of the medium here. Medium not considered, there seems a sort of bond between Boardman Robinson's murals and those of the two Mexican artists. But what is "primitive" in Rivera becomes more loosely "modern" in Robinson—modern in the best sense of the word, not in the sense of facile impishness and quackish distortion. He models his figures in somewhat the Mexican simplicity, conveying the third dimension without any particular fuss about anatomy. One could easily pounce on Mr. Robinson for his "anatomy," but it doesn't matter. He gets what he wants, what the illustration needs. And his people all have character.

Examine again the mural art of Diego Rivera (a valuable new book dealing with it has just been published by Harcourt, Brace & Co., containing 139 plates and clear, vigorous text by Ernestine Evans). You will realize at once that whereas Rivera grapples with the fundamental nature of his fellow-countrymen and takes brilliant sallies into the realms of satire and caricature, the American artist stays picturesquely on the surface and never "hits out." He is a kind of modern Pinturicchio, Rivera being our Giotto—with, of course, abundant difference.

Particularly in the work of Orozco one is impressed with a dramatic economy that does not figure in that of Boardman Robinson. Orozco, as we were permitted to observe in his two exhibitions last year, and as we may still remark in the prints and paintings at the Delphic Studios, depends largely upon striking patterns of a few very simple forms. He seems often to paint and to draw with fire. Robinson is never fiery. His art does not yet transcend illustration. But this is only the beginning, and, anyway, good illustration is not to be despised. The next wall problem he tackles must be in New York. Pittsburgh is too far away.

THE LANDSCAPE ART OF CHARLES H. DAVIS

WHILE fashions come and go, Charles H. Davis of Mystic continues quietly to paint landscapes informed with a fine sense of inward beauty. Sometimes a canvas will show traces of what we call "charm"; as a rule the truest rewards are to be sought rather than swept up off the surface at a glance. Like Eakins, Davis does not much concern himself with superficial values. He is out for the spirit of place, just as Eakins sets his divining rod for the spirit of men and women.

At the Macbeth Galleries are recent landscapes in many moods and covering all the seasons. "A Clearing in June," "Summertime," "Summer Morning" and other deeply considered compositions give us nature in her ripe loveliness: the earth, every inch of it alive, beneath clouds that invite the rarest dreaming. Ere this fullness, however, had come "Spring Gladness," "April and the Blue Pool," or just "April." And after the genial warmth, with skies less spacious and less smiling, "Autumn Sunshine," "October Pastoral" and "Growing Colder" lead straight to the wintry heart, hung with icicles and sleep.

Davis follows the seasons. He loves them all. But sometimes it seems as if he must love most tenderly those forlorner interims between, when snow has not yet tidily covered the fields, or has half yielded to the tempering harshness of March winds. These are bleak pauses, hours of indecision, with nature too lethargic, before or after slumber, to make herself festive. Soon she will array herself in splendor; but for that finery Davis waits not. He paints with loving care "Gray Fields" and is content. He is a child come home to the bosom of the all-wise Mother.

LOCAL ART NEWS IN BRIEF

PRINTS are being shown in several galleries this month. Etchings by Lepere are on view at Harlow McDonald & Co.; etchings of Blampied, Hankey, Boucet and Walcot at the Butler Galleries. Graphic work by Kerr Eby and old prints in color may be seen at Keppel's. Knoedler's exhibit old English color prints; Kennedy's, seven new etchings by Levon West. At the American Art Association-Anderson Galleries, Inc., are etchings and engravings destined to sale on the evenings of Dec. 12 and 13.

Current at the Art Centre is the second annual exhibition of Modern American Decorative Arts. The object of this exhibition is the encouragement and exposition of modern art wherever it displays itself in the fields of American industry.

A comprehensive exhibition of contemporary European poster art will open Dec. 9 at the Art Centre. It was assembled by Abbott Kimball of the advertising firm of Lyddon, Hanford & Kimball, Inc. Also at the Art Centre are Christmas cards by American artists, shown in the Art Alliance Gallery, and water-colors, designs for printed textiles, and bonnaz and cornely embroideries by Winifred Jackson.

The Central Museum of Western Art at Moscow has acquired two paintings by Charles Baskerville Jr., whose one-man show just closed at the Hackett Gallery. The purchase was made by Dr. D. H. Dubrowsky of the Russian Red Cross and Dr. Christian Brinton.

The eighteenth annual appeal for the Hundred Neediest Cases is made today.

FURTHER COMMENT ON THE ART EXHIBITIONS OF THE WEEK

A ROUND OF GALLERIES

Varied Work by Many Artists Affords a Stimulating Between-Holidays Panorama

By RUTH GREEN HARRIS.

IN a most simple manner and with a quiet voice Katherine Kunsella persuades the spectator to share her enthusiasm. She takes one back through the picture to her original purpose in painting it—to the way she herself was affected by a beautiful night, or by some flowers in a vase, or by the majesty of a high Italian wall. Her technique, fitting nicely the small size of the canvas, is so unobstrusive that in the presence of her work one does not think about manners of painting; one only remembers afterward a certain good taste; a daintiness that is almost a part of the individuality of the picture.

The lamplight in Taranto throws a cornucopia shadow half way up the side of an old wall. Two little figures move along through the night with a silent swagger that is truly Italian. It is pleasant to see a less conventional Venice; a green tree leaning up against a red house. A light seen through an archway of the Villa Medici is also treated in unconventional fashion; haunting shadows are less obviously picturesque than is customary in this subject. The moonlight on the high road to Florence seems a substance in itself; a caress that you can feel against your hand.

Leaving Italy, the artist paints a funny Victorian color box, with a certain respect for the craftsman who made the papier-mâché toy in the first place. The box is shaped like a lady in a bonnet and a full striped skirt. She holds a prim flower in a prim hand. Rather than a curio, she is a personality of her time. Katherine Kunsella—The Wildenstein Gallery—Closes Dec. 14.

IN Kenneth Hayes Miller's "Mother and Child With a Toy Balloon" paint that seems curiously at once metallic and transparent is sufficiently plastic to float the balloon in the air and to make secure the mother holding a child in her arms. All this artist's painting displays a nice sense of organized color. The blond eyes of a nude woman are the climax of a color that repeats itself throughout. The blue beads around the neck of a girl in "April Weather" are an intense moment of the blue that, with various changes, is woven through the scheme.

But Mr. Miller is more convincing as a painter of landscape. One feels that "The Church of the Paulist Fathers" is not a scheme but a moving experience—no doubt beautifully expressed, otherwise the spectator would not be moved by the experience, by the size of the sky and by the breadth of the land. Kenneth Hayes Miller—The Rehn Gallery.

Representing the famous artists of the time, J. Leger & Son are exhibiting some thirty-five English paintings of the eighteenth century. The carefully prepared catalogue will interest students of the period and add to the knowledge of those less well informed.

The ranking artists are Sir Joshua Reynolds, with a portrait of Lord Edgcumbe; John Hoppner, with the portraits of Mrs. Goldsmith and her daughter and a portrait of Henry Wilson, and George Romney, with "Richard Wilbraham Bootle." There is a delightful Hogarth; there is an important Gainsborough. The Gainsborough is considered a most excellent example, this opinion being fully supported by William Roberts, the leading authority on painting of the eighteenth century English school.

But ranks rise and fall. Important as the important pictures are, it is a far more adventurous occupation to make an independent judgment of an unknown artist than merely to follow an opinion that has become fixed by the influence of grand sounding names. And the power of fresh judgment may make new ranks.

A. R. Minx is the name of an unknown artist who was born in Spain and paints somewhat in the Dutch manner. His portrait of George, fourth Duke of Manchester, has fine majesty; a dramatic gesture. In Tilly Kettle's portrait of himself the black coat is a mellow color, relieved by the nice clarity of white lace at hand and throat. F. W. Watts makes landscapes in which one can find the church spire and country cottage Constable painted so often. But F. W. Watts is something of a primitive and, like a child, tries to see every leaf on the branch, enriching his work with something one might believe was the painter's individau charm. Eighteenth Century English Paintings—J. Leger & Son—Closes Dec. 15.

THE galleries of Marie Sterner show a group of foreign and domestic water-colors. John Woodruff painted his last Christmas when St. Paul A. M. distinguished itself by encountering a snowstorm. Pruna's very dignified still life is darker in color than his habitual oil. On a pleasing gouache by Verge Sarrat tall foreground trees grow high, dwarfing in their majesty a pretty landscape behind. Bernard Lintott's "Quartet" makes one remember how often one has said, looking at the performers, their instruments, the music and music stands: "Now there's a paintable subject!" The ships in G. Gallebart's harbor are ranged like recruits ready to count the one-two of some regimental order. One enjoys very much a city (by the same artist) that looks as if it were an Oriental town in a story. Only when it comes to a climax at the top with Sacré Coeur does one recognize Paris. Group of Water-Colors—Marie Sterner's Galleries.

Everett Hamilton's water-colors respond quickly to the physical character of the subject, whether it be a landscape or a human figure, and according to the subject, the nature of the composition is either relaxed or tensely active. In "Riding, Central Park," one feels the horse taut as it waits for the rider to mount. In "Circus" the body of a clown straightens itself to the task of balancing a weight. The landscape "Var Mountains" stimulates one to the difficult adventure of climbing. On the other hand, "Entrevaux," a tiny town against settled mountains, is as restful as a Summer holiday should be. In "Between Rounds" the prizefighter slumps into his chair, and on "The Beach" tired swimmers sink heavily into the sand. There is a sameness about the color. Green, on the grayish side, is brightened by spots of red. Everett Hamilton—Montross Gallery—Closes Dec. 14.

The models for glazed terra-cotta are Luis Mora's most delightful contribution to his exhibition. A "Navajo Maiden," "Her Mother" and "A Mexican Flower Vendor" give Mr. Mora happy opportunity for his pleasure in sharp contrasts of value, gay color and decorative detail. In fact, the small figures permit the artist to force all these qualities, even to the point of their becoming a little theatrical. One likes the theatre when it contains itself in so small a space, but is less in sympathy with a stage spread over a huge canvas, no matter how competently it is painted. Here, perversely enough, one wishes the decoration on a shawl were a little more discreet; that the expression on a child's face were a shade less winsome, and that both a beautiful peasant and the flowers in her basket were less self-conscious of the beauty. Luis Mora—Fifty-sixth Street Gallery—Closes Dec. 14.

Trying to think of some explanatory adjective for Harry Wickey's lusty etching about fighting crowds, rearing horses and a confusion of traffic between rows of neat city houses, one turns to the catalogue to find the fitting noun "jungle." Not that this artist dodges an issue and turns the ugly beautiful by making it look like something else. His things are beautiful because they look intensely themselves, without compromise. An unconventional etcher's line that curls with the vitality of feathers on the spine of an ostrich plume sustains the strength. Harry Wickey—The Civic Club—Closes Dec. 15.

True to itself, Durand-Ruel displays its taste for impressionism, exhibiting William S. Horton's impressionistic New York in misty orange and blue—or, to quote the artist's verse,

Towers of Gotham proud and bold
Of lapis, emerald and rose.

Charles Vezin (at the Century Club until Dec. 24) also finds in this city his greatest inspiration. He sees it, however, in its lady moods, but in spite of fragile "orchid color" it stands on sturdy enough foundation. One feels that whizzing up to some thirty-fourth story would be not necessarily a dangerous adventure. Fewer artists take advantage of the docks; Mr. Vezin draws their notched line against the river, a pleasant relief from the often repeated sky-line of New York. In the Summer he goes to the country to paint the white front of a New England house or its pleasant interior.

Edwin A. Park, architect, painter, critic, teacher and decorator, is holding an exhibition of water-colors. One that might have been entitled "Reflections" made a particularly strong impression. Reflection in two senses of the word; things remembered after due thought take on new dimensions in relation to their importance rather than to their actual size. These things in water-color are transparent and have at the same time a mirror-like surface. A large bird, a small house, a slanting tree, some land and water are scattered about with a truth stranger than the conventional fiction of perspective. Edwin A. Park—The A. P. P. Gallery—Closes Dec. 15.

There are all sorts of reasons for making a collection. Like Cousin Pons, some "amateurs" will buy nothing over sixty francs, sure that the value is far greater; others only want an object of art when it happens to be expensive; there are those who collect antiques regardless; and those who actually wish to own something that is beautiful. But Ruth Teschner Costantino, with a curious instinct for what should be hers by right, finds only what fits perfectly her own fastidious humor.

Though she is an authority, she is unmoved by the commercial value of an object, its nationality, its modishness, its antiquity or the fine sounding name of its maker. And yet her collection includes rare pieces of furniture, painting by important artists, the best periods of the best nations, and even she has found some straw boxes and a little table de paille that lately have become so fashionable. Part of the value of an object depends on the personalities that have come close to it. Mme. Constantino's collection will never lose something she has given it. For her collecting has become almost a creative art.

There are Queen Anne lacquer chairs, rare chinoiserie, blue brocades, a Louis XVI carved wood chandelier; there are carved wood figurines from a Neapolitan crèche, an engraved silver paci that was held for the devout to kiss, a portrait by Sir David Wilkie of George IV at his coronation. A Rowlandson is the more amusing for Mme. Constantino's finding him, as she would, in one of his less raucous moments. Painted by Isabey, the miniature of Napoleon shows the veins on the back of his fat hand and in a way helps to characterize the man. And a portrait in pastel by an unknown English artist of the eighteenth century is strangely sensitive, coming from that place at that time. Mme. Costantino's Collection—The Roland Moore Gallery. Closes Dec. 30.

At the same gallery, also during December, Miss Maud Earl is showing decorated screens. The difficult process of gold and silver leaf on silk is said to be expertly done. In many of the screens a flowering branch is placed so as to decorate the panel. The East has an instinct for this particular kind of designing and any Occidental attempt loses in comparison. In one screen two birds are struck with emotion as they gaze off across some water to a distant shore. Here there is something of a story to tell and the whole decoration gains in the telling.

On small canvases, Francis Newton works with a square brush. He puts down patches of dull violet, dull green and dull yellow and, varying the value rather than the color, makes fertile spots on sandy downs. His exhibition at the Grand Central Galleries closes Dec. 14.

SOME American artists seem to be fearful in a way of letting themselves go, terrified that off their guard they might use too much paint, be guilty of vulgarity or of betraying a lack of stoic control. For the tragic subject this would be perhaps an admirable manner, did it not give the subject more than its due importance. With a certain paradox the artist, stressing all the most artistic qualities of composition and color, is misled by his purposeful dodging of the state of his own emotions.

In Emile Branchard's picture about a weeping woman sitting on a bed, a man standing over her, the stark, flat paint, the admirable design and the refined color—all these exaggerate the tragedy until, by contrast, it becomes almost melodramatic. For the same reason one feels embarrassed before the portrait by V. Canadé, because, contrasting the tragic expression with the inflexible manner in which the picture is conceived, one cannot believe that this is honest misery.

The water-color by Walkowitz is happier. In a less obvious design, green and reddish trees keep a ruch of light green on the paper. Dr. Stam's houses are amusing also. They jump about as if some huge feather underneath were tickling them. With a humor that leaves one in no doubt about its truth, Bufano's excellent mask expresses a simple thought simple. American Painting and Sculpture—The Bourjeois Gallery—During December.

The G. R. D. Gallery calls its present exhibition frankly a Christmas Selling Show. The title is more than a broad hint. Pictures on the walls of all galleries are put there for sale. One knows more about a picture when it has not only stimulated the esthetic nerve but the "pocketbook nerve" as well. One loves a work of art more for having made some small sacrifice to obtain it. During the two months this reviewer has spent in America, visiting some twenty galleries a week, she has witnessed the purchase of only one picture, and that was bought by a colleague. Pictures are for sale. At the G. R. D. Gallery this particular sale will continue until Dec. 21. Contributions from many artists are sufficiently various to meet the needs of many clients.

Elsa Daglish, at the Babcock Gallery until Dec. 14, makes water-tints rather than water-colors. In the pleasantest, called "Batavia," worn, uneven steps on a curving street have shifted the balance of houses and settled them down onto a changed foundation. One house walks out from the angle of two converging streets.

Margaret Fitzhugh Browne, at the Ainslie Galleries until Dec. 14, paints portraits, surrounding her sitters with the paraphernalia of their vocations or their hobbies. She tells us of the bravery of Captain Howard Blackburn, who crossed the Atlantic from Gloucester, Mass., to Gloucester, England, single-handed in a thirty-foot sloop, the Great Republic.

Geoffrey Norman and his mother, Da Loria Norman, will show their works at the Denks Galleries until Dec. 14. Mr. Norman paints Breton types. They decorate the canvas with their own bright colors and with the pottery that has made Quimpère famous. Mrs. Norman, an able craftsman, makes illuminated manuscripts and water-colors in which she describes her own mystic spirit.

Under the patronage of his Highness Prince de Ligne, the Rev. Father O. A. Nys exhibits water-colors and paintings at the Belgian Bureau until Dec. 15. Small though it is, one likes particularly a drawing for "My Christmas Card," in which are seen, surrounded by a holly wreath, the harbor of Antwerp, the harbor of New York, and the brownstone front of the Belgian Bureau.

At the Barbizon are water-colors by Horace Raymond Bishop, who paints on a thick pebbley paper, letting the pigment settle a little into the uneven surface. His works have style and a convention that not only fills a space decoratively, but also suggests a spacious landscape.

Arraanged through the courtesy of Colonel O. Bantuckoff, L. and R. Brailowsky will exhibit at the Art Centre until Dec. 14. Their Russian paintings, half fairy-tale and half Byzantine, would make most suitable decoration for small pieces of furniture, especially if the bright color were translated into another medium, a medium with a surface hard and shiny as lacquer.

Winifred Jackson's water-color studies and designs for printed textiles and embroideries are also shown at the Art Centre. She has had the good taste to vary her designs, making them suitable for the textile on which they are to be printed—cretonne, chiffon or silk.

At Macy's, Nura's sententious angels scatter flowers about or look into the faces of terribly wise children being gymnastic. These drawings will be on exhibition until Christmas.

Advertisers know better than any layman what does and what does not sell. However, Victor Beal's exhibition at the Advertisers' Club seems to be a little too sentimental to meet everybody's taste and not quite gay enough to draw attention.

Fortunately for us, Leopold Seyffert has many musical friends and paints them, as Mr. Eggers says, "without affection, without flattery, without an axe to grind." The affection then is left to those who love to hear these artists play. The competently painted portraits of Kreisler or Stokowski or Frederick Stotesbury display to their audiences, perhaps for the first time, a thoroughly material aspect—the shape of eyes and noses and mouths. These shapes of things are not without their interest. Portraits by Leopold Seyffert—The Hackett Gallery—Closes Dec. 28.

The plan back of the present exhibition at the National Arts Club has been to tie in the various endeavors of the crafts in a color scheme that will be pleasing and at the same time show the interesting things that craftsmen are doing.

There are on exhibition terra-cottas of negro types by Anne Goldthwaite, furniture from Greenwich House, stone and wood carvings by Peter Paul Ott, a Madonna by R. Guy Cowan. Arthur Crisp has contributed murals and decorative gesso panels, Carl Schmitt a painted tapestry Madonna; Lydia Bush-Brown some of her silk murals; Katherine Lamb, stained glass. The Voorhees Pottery has made bowls in turquoise and orange glaze. Carl Freigang shows high fire pottery, including large jars with effective openwork treatment. The hand-wrought silver by Arthur Stone has beautiful texture. There is jewelry by Margaret Rogers, and there are some fine pieces of pewter.

The eighteenth annual appeal for the Hundred Neediest Cases is made today.

EVENTS OUT OF TOWN

THE twenty-seventh annual Philadelphia water-color exhibition and the twenty-eighth annual exhibition of miniatures draw to a close today in the rambling old building of the Pennsylvania Academy of the Fine Arts. This joint affair contained no less than 1,152 items—a really appalling number. It would require much time and patience to examine the whole output in a leisurely, thorough way. However, even a hasty survey of the galleries was sufficient to prove that the display had far more than just quantity to recommend it.

The work, of course, contained a wide variety of expression, which would be inevitable in so large a gathering. Besides this, the general impression received was that of very considerable freshness and enthusiasm. It would be difficult, indeed, to draw up a list of all the artists most deserving of special praise, but water-colors by the following particularly held the eye of one visitor whose time was extremely limited: W. Merton Heitland, Sara Bard, Edith A. Sternfeld, Charles Curtis Allen, Paul L. Gill, Joseph W. Jicha, Charles W. Hathorne, Wayman Adams, Jane Peterson, Wilmer S. Richter, Rutherford Boyd.

Minneapolis.

Thirty oils by Cleveland artists have been hung in the large painting gallery of the Minneapolis Institute. Another exhibition of importance is "Printing for Commerce," which opened Dec. 5 and remains through the month.

The archaeological expedition of the University of Minnesota and the Minneapolis Institute, which spent its second period in the Mimbres Valley, N. M., last Summer, returned with nearly 200 Mimbres bowls and hundreds of artifacts of interest.

VENICE REMINISCENT

City of Water-Magic Turns Back the Years, Re-enters Glamourous Eighteenth Century

By FRANCIS MONOTTI.

VENICE.

IT was an idea worthy of a prince. Never before have we had over here an exhibition that could offer a complete idea of what Italy had been able to create during a whole century in all the fields of art. Crown Prince Humbert of Savoy called to his aid the German Prince of Hesse, husband of his sister Mafalda, and a small number of art experts. The eighteenth century was chosen. This century, Il Settecento, is so near to us that we can almost touch it with our hand, and yet its art and its life are far less known to the general public than are those of more glorious centuries of the past — Quattrocento and Cinquecento. The eighteenth century is, as it were, a kind of dark age of modern history. Even teachers in schools seem to ignore it.

Venice! It is impossible to utter the words Il Settecento without arousing in the mind of an educated Italian first of all a vision of the Queen of the Adriatic hiding under the veneer of her gay and luxurious life the tragic decline of her power and of her independenc. The other parts of Italy, as if already waiting for the bugle of the Risorgimento, which was to sound a hundred years later, were then silent or lifeless. Only the slow and splendid agony of the Most Serene Republic of St. Mark seemed to fill that century with the feigned exuberance of her vitality and the last flare of her great and beautiful art.

IT may be said that all the world contributed to the success of this exhibition, which, inaugurated with great pomp at the end of July, remained open until a week or two ago. Not only from everywhere in Italy, but also from England and Germany, from France and Austria, the most rare, beautiful and curious specimens of the Italian art of the eighteenth century were sent to Venice, to be arranged in the forty-odd rooms of the central exhibition building at the Giardini.

Everything was there to be seen; every taste discovered its preference. All that the so-called minor arts produced was likewise represented, from the stately Neapolitan carriage that transported the "elected-by-the-people" to pay homage to the Bourbon King to the tiniest and daintiest of visiting cards that a dama di qualità ever left at the door of a friend.

There were exquisitely painted fans; snuffboxes in which kings had dipped their fingers; books illustrated and bound by master hands; timepieces that had ticked off some of the most weighty hours of history; almanacs foreseeing the course of stars and nations up to the end of the world; porcelains used for food and flowers by generations, without showing the smallest crack; beds in which princes were born and popes died; galla sedan chairs and sleighs; fire screens so beautiful as to deserve themselves every protection; and then Roman console tables, Piedmontese writing desks, Lombard cabinets, Genoese chests of drawers, Venetian armchairs, divans, thrones. . . .

Here, better than anywhere else, it was possible to study and comprehend that century's style, which, following upon the heels of the baroque, has remained to this day the last that Italy made. A well-known art critic has just expressed the opinion that this exhibition will probably start a new mode, especially for what concerns the decorative arts. If this means a new impulse for creative work, not merely an impulse to copy badly what has already been excellently done, it might be a very good thing.

BUT the real triumph of the exhibition proved, beyond doubt, the section allotted to painting. A number of the best pictures had never before been seen in Italy; they were painted by artists who were among the greatest travelers and vagabonds that the world had ever known; artists who had nonchalantly strewn their canvases all over creation.

For instance, there were some pictures by G. B. Piazzetta (who may be considered a most astonishing forerunner of modern art), pictures that have belonged for many years to an English family and seem to have remained totally unknown to the critics. Also the "Interior of the Pantheon," by G. P. Pannini, which was lent by the Kress collection, together with the "Crucifixion," by Tiepolo. It came all the way from New York. All the Italian newspapers agreed in regarding it and its twin picture, "Navona Square Flooded," as real masterpieces.

American tourists (and Venice has not often welcomed so many as this year) liked to stop also in front of another picture, a big tapestry, of the Tuscan school, representing America. It shows a group of beautiful women, scantily dressed and richly adorned with the traditional Indian feathers, while the sky opens to give way to the chariot of progress in full swing. It is as essentially true to life today as it was then. And if you stop to think that in 1720, when this tapestry was made, George Washington was not yet born, it cannot be denied that the imagination of the ancient artist was pretty good!

Guardi, a pupil of Canaletto and brother-in-law of Tiepolo, is a most delicate and refined painter, endowed with a sense of humor to the very tips of his fingers and of his brushes. He leaves aside the eternally recurring historical and religious subjects to plunge into genre. He refuses the help of his imagination in order better to look and to see. He does not compose any longer; he observes. That is, he works from nature. For this reason Guardi is considered an innovator and a precursor. His "Concert of Venetian Ladies," belonging to the Munich Museum, is as ringingly modern and impressionistic as any of the present day could be.

Naturally it is Tiepolo who played first fiddle in the Venetian show. Sketches, designs, paintings, frescoes—everything shown was of the very first order. Tiepolo did not paint ideas; he hardly painted images; he painted light. Fiat Lux! In Venice only Foscarini the doge, Emo the admiral, Marcello the musician can be compared with him. A century that in one single town produced men such as these deserves recognition.

LEAVING this eighteenth century spectacle one did not enter, beneath the open dome of sky, a world altogether changed. Venice waits outside. And surely Venice is the least modern, least changed of Italian cities. Illusion is allowed to continue as long as we choose.

A gondola suddenly appears around the corner of Sant' Elena Canal. A faint ripple is all that can be heard.

"Gondola, signor?" calls out the man.

Why not? With twenty lire I can add the last touch to my eighteenth century illusion, make my dream complete. It is cheap!

Only in this way should leave be taken of a Venetian exhibition like that of the Settecento Italiano.

Boston.

A moving picture demonstrating the process of drypoint has recently been completed for the Boston Museum of Fine Arts. Illustration of the etching process demonstrated by Frank W. Benson was the subject of the museum's first moving picture, shown last May. An exhibition of drypoints and etchings from the fifteenth century to the present, will remain in the five Renaissance Court galleries through Dec. 10.

San Francisco.

A sixteenth century painting of St. Francis of Assisi believed by experts to be the work of El Greco has been discovered in San Francisco, according to The San Francisco Chronicle. The discovery was made by George Barron, curator of the M. H. De Young Museum. His attention had been drawn to it by Clark Johnson, who had bought the painting for $7.50 in a second-hand store.

A CROWDED MID-DECEMBER PROGRAM LOOMS FOR SOCIETY

THE LEAGUE'S GALA DAY

Junior Group to Play Host Tomorrow at New Clubhouse

ANOTHER milestone in the progress and achievements of the Junior League of New York will be marked tomorrow with the formal opening and dedication of a new and luxurious clubhouse at 221 East Seventy-first Street. Coming as it does in the midst of one of the busiest seasons New York society has known, the opening is regarded by members of the league and their hosts of friends as a fitting tribute to the incentive shown by the members and the hard work they have put in to forward the erection of their new home.

Older members of the league, whose interests will take them to the new quarters tomorrow afternoon, no doubt will contrast the splendor of the quarters with the unpretentious ones that housed the first departments of the Junior League more than a score of years ago.

Beginning with a mere handful of members in 1901, the league has grown with the ever-widening circle of society and its scope has expanded accordingly. In the first part of the century, Miss Mary Harriman, now Mrs. Charles Cary Rumsey, a daughter of Mrs. E. Henry Harriman and the late Mr. Harriman, organized the league with a number of her friends.

The then Miss Harriman was a student at Barnard College and many of her interests centred in college settlement work. She gave the club the name of the Junior League for the Betterment of the New York College Settlement. The work of the league then was of narrow scope, and the first meetings were held in private homes.

WITH the expansion of activities in a few years the organization took a new name—the Junior League for the Promotion of the Settlement Movement. Progress again changed the name when the members undertook "neighborhood work," and in 1912 the present title, the Junior League of the City of New York, was adopted. Seven years later the club rented quarters in an unpretentious office at 6 East Forty-fifth Street, where it functioned for several years.

Through the course of years a wide field of work came under the management of the Junior League. Their efforts in settlement and neighborhood improvement became widely known, and like organizations sprang up in leading cities throughout the East.

Their methods were thorough. An intensive course of training was required of débutantes who were asked to join the league.

With the addition of hundreds of new members every few years, the need for quarters of its own became a necessity, and in 1924 the league moved into 133 East Sixty-first Street, their first clubhouse. The move was considered a great step forward. The quarters were spacious for the league of those days. Miss Alice D. Pennington, then president, announced at the time that the league had grown to a membership of well over 1,500.

IN four more years the league's activities grew to such an extent thet even this house became inadequate. To meet the situation the members embarked on one of their most ambitious ventures, the acquisition of property for the erection of a clubhouse that would fulfill every need.

Officially the Sixty-first Street house will be occupied until tomorrow, although the process of moving into the new building work has already been under way and entertainments have been given in the Seventy-first Street headquarters.

At the ceremonies tomorrow the present officers of the Junior League will receive. They include Mrs. John De Witt Peltz, president; Mrs. L. H. Paul Chapin, vice president; Miss Marian Willard, secretary, and Miss Elizabeth Stillman, treasurer. Visitors will be escorted through the building. Tea will be served, and there will be music by the Eddie Davis Orchestra.

Many members of the league are now actively interested in the proposed theatrical performance "Sonya's Search for the Christmas Star," which is to be presented by the Junior League Players on Dec. 13, 14, 20 and 21 at the Walter Hampden Theatre.

DIRECTORS of St. Joseph's Day Nursery, 469 West Fifty-seventh Street, have taken over the performance of "Salt Water" at the John Golden Theatre tomorrow night. The net proceeds will be used to defray expenses of the nursery, which last year attended the wants of 3,000 needy children every month. Mrs. William J. Graham heads the Ladies Auxiliary. Other officers are Mrs. Emmett McLaughlin, Miss Eleanor McGovern and Mrs. Edmund Brennan, 167 Paine Avenue, New Rochelle, from whom tickets may be obtained.

For the benefit of the New York Consumers' League tickets for the matinee performance of "Sons o' Guns" at the Imperial Theatre on Dec. 26 are being sold by a committee of patronesses. Tickets may be obtained from Miss Fanshawe at 685 Madison Avenue.

At the Shubert Theatre the performance of "The Street Singer" for tomorrow night has been secured for the benefit of the Auxiliary of Jewish Big Sisters, of which Miss Bertha Levin is president. The proceeds will go toward Camps Blue Bird and Anchorage, where more than 600 poor children have Summer vacations. Among the patronesses are Mrs. Sidney C. Borg, Mrs. Joseph Hardy, Mrs. Simon Frankel and Mrs. Eph Karelsen.

MUSICAL EVENTS TO RAISE FUNDS

Benefit Opera Performances Are Arranged for the Florence Crittenton League and Smith Club

THE Florence Crittenton League, in order to further its work among unfortunate young women in New York, has taken over the matinee performance at the Metropolitan on Thursday of "Don Giovanni." Since the first announcements of the league several weeks ago, there has been a steady sale of boxes and tickets for this performance, and more than a week ago it was stated that all the parterre boxes had been taken.

A brilliant audience is expected for the performance, which has been arranged by Mrs. Hermann M. Biggs and the members of her committee. The net proceeds will aid the maintenance of the shelter conducted by the league at 427 West Twenty-first Street. To date this year more than 800 girls have been assisted there, this number including those who have come voluntarily for care and aid, and those sent by the courts or District Attorneys pending investigation or trial.

Through the aid of the shelter they are saved the stigma of detention in jails and from association with unwholesome characters. The league depends for its support entirely upon voluntary contributions and the benefits it arranges.

The cast for the performance will be headed by Ponselle, Rethberg, Fleischer, Gigli, Pinza, Rothier, Lodikar and d'Angelo.

Among those who have taken boxes are Princess Henry XXXIII of Reuss, Mrs. Henry Morgan Tilford, Mrs. Joseph P. Grace, Mrs. Lewis R. Morris, Mrs. W. Campbell Clark, Mrs. M. Taylor Pyne, Mrs. Christian R. Holmes, Mrs. Percival J. McIntosh, Mrs. M. Orme Wilson, Mrs. John N. Willys, Mrs. Andrew Carnegie, Mrs. Adolf Ladenburg, Edwin S. Bayer, Mrs. Edwin Gould, Mrs. Edwin M. Bulkley, Mrs. E. T. Goodrich, Miss Georgina Iselin, Mrs. Sidney Borg, Mrs. Sidney Z. Mitchell, Mrs. George Post, Mrs. W. Watts Sherman, Mrs. Marius de Brabant, Mrs. Cornelius N. Bliss, Mrs. James Lees Laidlaw, Mrs. James Roosevelt, Edward F. Hutton, Mrs. William T. Hildrup, Mrs. James Burtis Van Woert, Charles Hayden, Mrs. Edward S. Harkness, Mrs. Benjamin Stern, Mrs. W. Bayard Cutting and Miss Anne Morgan.

Others who have subscribed include Mrs. Oliver Gould Jennings, Mrs. Hobart Porter, Mrs. Devereux Emmet, Mrs. Charles Dana Gibson, Mrs. Charles de Rham, Mrs. O'Donnell Iselin, Mrs. Thatcher M. Brown, Mrs. John Greenough, Mrs. Charles D. Hilles, Mrs. William B. Osgood Field, Mrs. John H. Finley, Mrs. George G. Haven, Mrs. Henry W. Munroe, Mrs. Robert Livingston Stevens, Mrs. Ridley Watts and Mrs. Plummer Schley.

BRIDAL DATES ARRANGED

Notable Weddings in England—Plans of Miss Phipps

THERE will be two weddings in England this month in which society here is very much interested both prospective brides, the Misses Joyce Phipps and Margaret Ethel Leigh, having many relatives in this country.

Miss Phipps, who is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Paul Phipps will be married to Reginald Pascoe Grenfell on Thursday in St. Margaret's Church, Westminster. The ceremony is to be followed by a large reception at the home of Viscountess Astor, 4 St. James's Square, an aunt of Miss Phipps.

The mother of the bride-to-be is the former Nora Langhorne, youngest of the five beautiful daughters of the late Mr. and Mrs. Chiswell D. Langhorne of Virginia. She is a niece of Mrs. Charles Dana Gibson of this city. On the paternal side, Miss Phipps is a granddaughter of Mrs. William Wilton Phipps, formerly of this city but who now lives in London, and a great-granddaughter of the late Mr. and Mrs. W. Butler Duncan who for many years lived at 1 Fifth Avenue.

Mr. Grenfell is the son of Lieut. Col. Arthur Morton Grenfell who was one of the leading polo players of England at the time the American "Big Four" captured the International cup at Hurlingham. His mother, who died some years ago, was Lady Victoria Sybil Mary Grey, daughter of the fourth Earl Grey. She was named for Queen Victoria who was her godmother. Mr. Grenfell is a cousin of the present Lord Grenfell.

MANY invitations have been received here for the marriage of Miss Margaret Ethel Leigh to Charles Graves which also takes place in St. Margaret's, Westminster, on the afternoon of December 17. Miss Leigh is the daughter of the Hon. and Mrs. Rowland Charles Frederick Leigh of 26 Upper Berkeley Street, London. She is a niece of the present Baron Francis Dudley Leigh of Stoneleigh Abbey, whose first wife was the beautiful Miss Helene Forbes Beckwith, daughter of the late N. M. Beckwith of New York.

Miss Leigh has many American relatives on the maternal side. Her mother is the former Miss Mabel Gordon, daughter of the late General W. W. Gordon of Savannah, Ga., who during the Civil War served in the Confederate Army.

She is well known in this city having frequently visited the late Mrs. De Lancey Nicoll, who was her cousin. Miss Leigh is a granddaughter of the second Baron Leigh. Mr. Graves is a son of Mr. and Mrs. A. P. Graves of Eribfa, Harlech.

IN Phoenix, Ariz., on Thanksgiving Day, Miss Helen E. Farley, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Robert E. Farley of 29 Greenridge Avenue, White Plains, N. Y. was married to William H. Mackay. The wedding, which took place in the First Presbyterian Church there, is of wide interest here especially in Westchester County, where the bride has many friends.

Only a small gathering of relatives and friends, including the bride's mother, were present at the ceremony, which was performed by the Rev. Victor A. Rule, and at the wedding breakfast which followed at the Arizona-Biltmore.

Miss Marion Hill of Cleveland, Ohio, attended the bride as maid of honor and Jerry Courtney of Phoenix, was best man.

Mr. Mackay and his bride have gone to California on their wedding trip. They will live in Phoenix where he is associated with the law firm of Ellenwood & Ross. The bride was graduated from the Briarcliff School and from Miss Wright's School in Bryn Mawr. She is a member of the Mahopac Golf, the Westchester Hills Golf, the Mahopac Country and the Contemporary Clubs of White Plains, N. Y.

She has the distinction of being the first woman golf champion at the Mahopac Golf Club, having won the championship last Summer. Mr. Mackay was graduated from the Western University and from Columbia Law School.

BEAUX ARTS BALL BIDS TO GO OUT

Plans for Costumes for Annual Event Call for Designs Of French and Italian Renaissance

INVITATIONS are to be sent out next week for the annual Beaux Arts ball which will be held on the night of Jan. 24 in the grand ballroom suite of the Hotel Astor. Because of the wide interest always shown in the event among members of society, plans usually are made this far in advance to form parties, especially so as to procure proper costumes.

Following the custom of many years in choosing some historical period, usually French, for the setting of the ball, the committees have arranged that the romantic era of the Renaissance shall be represented this time. It is expected that the costumes and general decorative effects of the ball this season will be the most lavish and beautiful yet devised.

Ernest Peixotto and Joseph H. Freedlander, who head the costume committee and who are most active in the preparations, have announced that an extensive exhibition of costume plates, created by men celebrated in the field of art and design, will be held from Dec. 26 to Jan. 11 at the French Institute, 20 East Sixtieth Street.

Those planning to attend the ball will find the exhibit of great assistance in the preparation of costumes of French and Italian design. There will be no Spanish designs in the showing, as it was decided recently not to include the Spanish Renaissance in the decorative motif.

Among the prominent designers and artists to be represented at the exhibition are James Reynolds, Tony Sarg, Neysa McMein, Edward Trumbull, John E. Sheridan, Russell Patterson, John Held Jr., Mary MacKinnon, Ben Ali Haggin and Ruth Eastman. James Monroe Hewlett has completed his design for the ballroom decorations, while the scenario for the elaborate pageant to feature the ball is now being developed by Philip A. Cusachs and Mr. Haggin.

Prominent architects, painters, sculptors and members of society are included in the large group concerned with plans for the ball, which will benefit the Beaux Arts Institute of Design in its educational work among 3,000 pupils throughout the country. The institution has become the largest of its kind in the world, and is directed by the Society of Beaux Arts Architects.

PARTY FOR CIVIC UNIT

FOR the benefit of its civic fund, the Women's Civic Organization, of which Miss Ella T. Sullivan is president, will give a card party and dance on Friday night at the Commodore. This fund, which is applied to educational work in connection with the public schools, also gives political instruction to women.

THE LIGHTHOUSE PLANS A DANCE

PRELIMINARY arrangements are well under way for the annual tea dance in aid of the Lighthouse of the New York Association for the Blind, which will take place at the Ritz-Carlton on Dec. 28. The junior board of directors, of which W. Lawrence McLane is president, will be in charge.

This organization, which has its headquarters at 111 East Fifty-ninth Street, maintains a recreational program for the blind which includes boxing classes, swimming, bowling and amateur dramatics. During the last few months the men's and women's musical organizations of the Lighthouse have had their programs broadcast. The proceeds from the tea dance will be devoted to the Winter's recreational work.

Among the patronesses are Mrs. Harry C. Cushing 3d, Mrs. Edward Prime, Mrs. John T. Pratt, Mrs. K Blythe Emmons, Mrs. Hugh Auchincloss, Mrs. Joseph C. Baldwin 3d, Mrs. William A. Greer, Mrs. Jay Gould, Mrs. Oliver H. P. La Farge, Mrs. Ethelbert H. Low, Mrs. Harold W. Scott, Mrs. Hernand S. Behn, Mrs. Elisha Dyer, Mrs. Thomas C. Desmond, Mrs. Franklin W. CHURCHWOMEN'S LEAGUE BRIDGE ON WEDNESDAY

THE Churchwomen's League for Patriotic Service will hold its annual bridge and tea on Wednesday afternoon at the Roosevelt for the benefit of its many activities. Mrs. Henry Gansevoort Sanford is president of the organization and Mrs. George T. Mortimer and Miss Marguerite E. Valentine have charge of the afternoon.

Among the patronesses are Mrs. William T. Manning, Mrs. George D. Ali, Mrs. Ryder Henry, Mrs. John H. Hall Jr., and others.

NOTABLE SOCIAL AFFAIRS IN AID OF VARIED CAUSES

Manhattan Girl Scout Council to Hold the First Large Party in New Junior League Clubhouse —Yorkville Community Centre Dance

ON Tuesday afternoon the first large party at the Junior League's new clubhouse will be given by the Manhattan Council of Girl Scouts to further the scouting program of this city. Mrs. Archibald Thatcher will supervise the tournament, and Girl Scouts will be ushers. There will be tea and a brief entertainment.

Mrs. Oliver H. P. La Farge is chairman, assisted by Mrs. John Hudson Hall Jr., Mrs. Charles Lawrence Riker, Miss Clara Workum and a junior committee made up of the Misses Carola Winter, May Swords, Barbara Stout, Virginia Schroeder, Lysbet Lefferts, Margaret La Farge, Talia Fairchild, Constance Dane, Elsie Barber, and a débutante committee composed of Mary Williams, Janet Stone, Helen Schroeder, Gwendolyn Romme, Mary Pell, Eugenia Morris, Alison Morice, Mary Haskell and Rose Davis.

Patronesses include Mrs. Harold Pardee, Mrs. Henry I. Riker, Mrs. Samuel Riker, Mrs. Alexander V. Roe, Mrs. Walter N. Rothschild, Mrs. John D. Ryan, Mrs. Henry V. Poor, Mrs. Mortimer L. Schiff, Mrs. Robert H. Simpson, Mrs. Benson Bennett Sloan, Mrs. Mathew S. Sloan, Mrs. Samuel Sloan, Mrs. Donald Stralem, Mrs. Benjamin B. Theyer, Mrs. Frederick K. Trask, Mrs. Ramsay Turnbull, Mrs. John M. Tuttle, Mrs. Ernest F. Tyler, Mrs. Giles Whiting, Mrs. Percy H. Williams, Mrs. Rodney W. Williams, Mrs. Louis Condit Hay, Mrs. James P. Hendrick, Mrs. William H. Hoffman, Mrs. Elon Huntington Hooker, Mrs. Walter E. Hope, Mrs. Hamilton L. Hoppin, Mrs. J. Horton Ijams, Mrs. Morris W. Kellogg, Mrs. Chauncey Marshall, Mrs. Charles E. Mitchell, Mrs. R. Burnham Moffat, Mrs. Edward N. Morris, Mrs. Lewis R. Morris, Mrs. Frederick S. Moseley Jr., Mrs. A. Henry Mosle, Mrs. Deas Murphy, Mrs. Joseph L. Myers, Miss Elizabeth T. Nicholas, Mrs. Arthur W. Page and Mrs. Douglas W. Paige.

Also Mrs. Frederick T. Bedford, Mrs. Hernand Behn, Mrs. Allan B. A. Bradley, Mrs. Nicholas F. Brady, Mrs. Pierre Cartier, Mrs. Arthur Osgood Choate, Mrs. Charles W. Clinton, Mrs. C. JAN. 29 has been set as the date for the annual charity ball of the New York Chapter of the Knights of Columbus, to be held in Madison Square Garden in aid of the social service and welfare work of the the local knights. Thomas J. Gray heads the organization, and Frederick F. Mullins will have charge of the ball.

The chapter yearly spends thousands of dollars on hospitalization and maintains, among other endeavors in the social service field, an employment bureau through which men and women of all creeds are placed in remunerative positions. An emergency relief distributes Christmas baskets to the inmates of more than twenty-five orphanages and homes for the afflicted and aged, as well as providing four-year collegiate scholarships for ambitious sons of poor parents.

The officers, besides Mr. Gray, include William H. Wanner, James McGinniss, John J. O'Hare, Walter A. Lynch, James T. Hallinan, John J. Giblin, Joseph J. Drake, John J. Downing, John P. Brannigan, John A. Saunders and David C. Broderick.

Phyfe, Mrs. James Lees Laidlaw, Mrs. Arthur Curtiss James, Mrs. Waldine Z. Kopperl, the Misses Josephine L. Beekman, Mildred Miller, Harriet Munday and Margaret L. Suckley.

UNUSUAL GIFT ARTICLES ON DISPLAY THIS YEAR

Shoppers May Find in the Byways and Avenues an Assorted Lot of Goods from Workshops of Many Corners of the World

IN the stores, small or large, may be found this holiday season a most varied and heterogeneous display of trinkets, gewgaws and knick-knacks, not to mention the more valuable art objects and bric-à brac, and those fruits of man's labor which combine beauty with utility and thus form desirable Christmas gifts.

If one examines, for instance, the art in ash receivers now being displayed in the stores, one will find it in almost endless variety, from the tray made of the turquoise wing of a South American butterfly, to the beaten brass tray of semi-Oriental stamp to be found in the Russian brass shops of Allen Street.

There in Allen Street, too, are to be discovered many objects, such as book ends, door knockers, andirons, tea trays, candelabra and lamp stands, which combine a great measure of utility with their picturesquely exotic character—more, it must be said, than the samovar, staple stock-in-trade of these den-like shops. That vessel being merely for the purpose of keeping water hot, and not in itself for brewing tea, has to depend nowadays largely on its ornamental qualities as a salable object.

Most of these brass shops deal largely in reproductions made by their own workmen, Russians, Turks and Syrians resident in New York. There is one shop, however, a little den below Canal Street, that devotes itself to the genuine antique brass work. Old horse pistols, a samovar used by one of the Alexanders or possibly by his relatives, and small ikons of curious design dating back several centuries are among the objects here displayed.

Syrian Goods and Irish Belleek.

Across to the west side, in an out-of-the-way nook only a short block from the canyons of downtown New York, one finds clustered about a corner of Rector and Washington Streets a small village of Syrian exiles plying a brisk trade in Damascus linens, in "hulwaie" (Oriental sweetmeats), in prayer mats and mosaic woodwork of Oriental design. Here is to be purchased, among other things, the original far-famed Turkish Delight confection, nowadays well-nigh forgotten.

Expeditions into other out-of-the-way parts of town will cover an amazing range of merchandise. Take pottery. On Third Avenue in the Seventies, in the centre of a region overwhelmingly Hibernian, and also on Madison Avenue in the Fifties, are small stores selling the creamy, genuine Belleek porcelain from the west of Ireland, extremely delicate and intricate in its design.

Down on Pearl Street, among a conglomeration of canned fruits, oils and extracts imported from Spain, one runs across a basket of colorfully designed earthenware simply reeking of old Spain in the faithfully Moorish line of a miniature water-jar. In Thirty-fourth Street one finds the Italian, Florentine and Etruscan ware. In one shop is an ash tray bearing a bas-relief of the head of Savonarola. This particular shop shows a varied display of the Madonna and Child and copies of Della Robbia's Bambino. Further up the street one comes across a display of jardinières and other garden ornaments of the simple yet graceful stancl pottery of Austria. Moving to a Russian bazaar in Fifty-seventh Street one finds an extraordinary display of the earthenware and wooden carvings from that country. One becomes fascinated by the originality in the shades of coloring.

Pieces From the Orient.

The Chinese, specialists in cloisoné work, are represented not only in Chinatown but in many parts of the city. To those to whom thrift is an object, the handiwork of the Japanese will recommend itself. On account of the cheapness of labor in that country they are able to sell at low prices. An entire tea set, for instance, consisting of six cups and a teapot, is to be had in several of the department and smaller stores at prices in the neighborhood of 69 cents.

Here and there in the city, and apparently on the increase, is the kind of store called the Cuckoo Clock Shop. Owned by Swiss or German proprietors, these small shops seem to make their way year in and year out. The staple article of these shops is the cuckoo clock, an object which apparently enjoys a perpetual popularity. In addition, these stores do a thriving trade in Swiss woodcarvings, music boxes, ivory and amber trinkets.

Several of them display the china kitchen clock in a great variety of forms, some of which are not stamped "Germany," but are a home product. One particular clock, made from a reversed copper frying pan, with a knife for the large hand and a fork for the small, and even a small mustard spoon for the second hand, is deemed to be extraordinarily effective in a kitchen. Decorative beer steins also form a lucrative stock-in-trade.

There is another kind of clock shop that is worthy of mention. This is the shop specializing only in antique clocks—German, French, Dutch, Austrian, Chinese, Japanese, Old English, Early American, grandfather, skeleton, picture, rotary and even ancient water clocks.

In one such shop there is an Act of Parliament clock, dating from the time when clocks were taxed in England, and a water clock (1626) that is said to be "worth $5,000." The owner, eyeglass in eye, fondly shows to customers a chronometer, swinging face upward in a metal rim, for which he says he searched ten years, a ship's chronometer, by "John Fletcher, Lombard Street, London, makers to the Admiralty." He bought it from a Scotsman in the Bowery.

Another clock which he shows with a wry smile is a fake grandfather clock. From the old body the precious machinery had been surreptitiously removed and, through the inexperience of the crook, replaced with the machinery of a grandmother clock.

Among modern novelties that have a brisk sale this season is the pocket adding machine, no bigger than an ordinary wallet. It adds up to 999,999. In the Czechoslovak shops one may find, in addition to the Russian and Slavonian peasant blouses and costumes, brightly painted wooden novelties of many sorts. Distinctly new is a napkin ring in the form of a painted duck. By placing the napkin in the ring the effect of a duck with spread wings is produced.

ILLITERACY ABROAD

DENMARK, Norway, Sweden and Switzerland have very little illiteracy, according to a report issued by the United States Bureau of Education. This is attributed to the rigid systems of compulsory education in those countries and to the homogeneity of the races which has resulted from the comparatively small number of immigrants they have received. In the United States there are 4,931,905 illiterates—the test for literacy being ability to read and write any language, not necessarily English.

WORK OF HOSPITAL PATIENTS TO BE PUT ON SALE THIS WEEK

Occupational Therapy Contributes to Recovery From Illness and Often Aids Economically

THE handiwork of patients in the occupational therapy departments of New York hospitals—work which frequently serves the double purpose of contributing to recovery from illness and relieving pressing economic needs—is to be offered for sale at the Women's City Club, 22 Park Avenue, during the week of Dec. 9 to 14 inclusive.

Although the truth behind the science of occupational therapy is really as old as the science of medicine itself, the introduction of the method as a systematic part of the treatment in hospital cases is comparatively recent. In New York an investigation made by the New York visiting committee of the State Charities Aid Association, headed by Miss Marion Taber and under the chairmanship of John Pratt, led to the introduction of occupational therapy work on Blackwells Island in 1916 and spread to other local institutions until it is now in general use in New York hospitals.

Before the war there were so few trained workers in this field that when General Pershing cabled the Surgeon General of the army for 2,000 occupational therapy aides to be sent abroad immediately there were less than fifty available. Three large schools were organized during the war in Boston, Philadelphia and Cleveland and a special course was started at Teachers College, Columbia University. These schools today are all in active operation.

Aided by the City.

Until 1923 the entire program for occupational therapy in Greater New York was financed by the State Charities Aid Association, a private organization. Then the city, recognizing the importance of the work, granted a certain allowance for salaries. All the supplies are still paid for by the State Charities Aid Association and its subsidiary organizations. They also pay the salaries of a number of the workers, as well as adding to the sum advanced by the municipality in cases where that amount proves inadequate.

It is only by seeing occupational therapy actually at work in one of the big city hospitals that one can gain a vivid idea of what this department accomplishes for the paintortured or mentally harassed patient. The staff of trained aides is directly under medical supervision. Sometimes a physician desires that a patient work only a few minutes at a time; frequently the objective is to break the tedium of long hours of enforced idleness. All the work is carefully adapted to the individual patient's condition.

In the surgical wards the work is started at the patient's bedside. Frequently the worker at first only talks to the patient, then a little later gives him or her some small job of a "diversional" nature. Sometimes during these preliminary talks some family worry is disclosed; the social worker is then sent for and comes to see the patient. After hearing the story she seeks to provide the necessary home adjustment, knowing the patient's condition is more likely to improve if home needs, such as rent and proper supervision of the children, have been supplied.

Gradually, as the recovery progresses, the more curative side of occupational therapy comes into play. Certain exercises are given, and when the patient is well enough he is allowed to go to the hospital shop, where work is done on machines especially designed to meet the needs of muscular rehabilitation.

Help Toward Self-Support

Still another aspect of the work in occupational therapy is shown by the Shelter Shops. Formerly, when patients were dismissed, they looked forward to long weeks of enforced idleness before they would be able to work full time. They had to fight against a dispirited condition, lethargy generated in illness, and in some instances were sent to almshouses and institutions. Today, through Shelter Shops, they receive work and are able to support themselves on a commercial basis. Toys, leather goods and furniture are among the things patients are taught to make.

A number of these shops are maintained through different organizations. The Convalescent Work Shop, 49 East Twenty-first Street, is operated by the New York Visiting Committee and is 52 per cent self-supporting. It accepts patients from any public or semi-public hospital of the city able to do work for the needle trades.

The possibilities of occupational therapy have enlisted the support of the Women's City Club. The annual sale, which is the sole channel of distribution of the things made in the big city hospitals throughout the year, is the only one permitted in the clubhouse.

THE FAIRHOPE FOUNDATION TO HAVE A SUPPER-DANCE

A SUPPER DANCE will be held at Sherry's on the night of Dec. 22 for the benefit of the Fairhope Foundation, which aids the Mrs. Marietta Johnson School in Fairhope, Ala.

Mrs. Willis Gemmill Mitchell is chairman for the dance and Miss Kathryn Siedenburg heads a débutante committee for it. Others actively interested are Mrs. Charles Lanier, Mrs. William Herbert Wiley, Mrs. Frederic Sterry, Mrs. Reinard Siedenburg, Mrs. Godfrey Conze, Mrs. John Wray, Mrs. William Roby, Mrs. Nevill Gardiner, Mrs. William Arms, Mrs. Walter Schneckenberger, Mrs. James Quan, Mrs. William A. Ferguson and Mrs. Johnson.

INTERIOR OF LINCOLN'S TOMB IS AT LAST TO BE REMODELED

State of Illinois Is Preparing for Impressive Alterations In the Venerable Shrine at Springfield

THE long planned remodeling of the tomb of Abraham Lincoln in Oak Ridge Cemetery, Springfield, Ill., is soon to be undertaken. The alterations will be of special importance to visitors who come daily by hundreds for it is primarily to increase the comfort of visitors and to deepen their impression of the shrine that the changes are to be made. Outwardly, little is to be attempted except necessary repairs, but the whole arrangement and finish of the interior is to be improved.

The monument at Lincoln's grave was erected with funds raised from the country at large by the Lincoln Monument Association. Designed by Larkin G. Mead, it was completed and dedicated in 1874, nine years after Lincoln's death. In 1895 it became the property of the State and a few years later was restored and in large part rebuilt. On a massive stone platform, topped with a balustrade, it stands today, the shaft of its granite obelisk rising 121 feet above the centre of the mausoleum, whose dimensions are approximately 119 by 72 feet. At the corners of the obelisk are four groups of bronze figures, symbolizing the fighting forces of the United States, and before one of the faces stands the figure of Lincoln in heroic size. On the southern side of the mausoleum is a rotunda, balanced on the northern side by a sarcophagus chamber.

For the exterior it is proposed only to close the tower so that rain will not seep through the ports, to provide new supporting steel work above the base of the monument and to replace the asphalt pavement with dark brown tiles. The interior, however, will be practically reconstructed, use being made for the first time of the hitherto empty space beneath the shaft. The rotunda, formerly used to house a Lincoln collection, will be transformed into a reception room connected with the sarcophagus chamber by a corridor in the form of a square to follow the inside base line of the monument on the inside.

The skylight is to be removed from the rotunda and replaced with a ceiling of gold leaf, and a system of cove lighting is to be installed. The reception room is to be faced with marble-fluted pilasters, crowned with bronze wreaths, alternating with panels bearing bronze tablets on which are to be inscribed some of Lincoln's speeches, and the floor will be of marble tile in patterns of color. Bronze chandeliers will illumine the marble and bronze corridor. At corners of the corridor will stand Grecian funeral urns.

The casket of Lincoln, incased in red Arkansas fossil and bearing the inscription, "Abraham Lincoln, 1809-1865," will rest on a block carved with draped festoons and floral decorations, with flag stands at its base.

The present heating system is to be enlarged to keep the entire space comfortable in all seasons and a modern ventilation system is to be installed.

The State of Illinois is prepared to spend $175,000 on the improvements to Lincoln's tomb, which was visited last year by 141,041 visitors from all parts of the world. This work is part of a wide plan for preserving the show spots of the State.

USE OF MUSEUMS IN THE EVENINGS

THE British Royal Commission appointed to study the problems of British national museums and galleries, under the chairmanship of Lord D'Abernon, has recently issued the first part of its final report, and has proposed, among other things, that the galleries be opened in the evenings to permit working people to visit them. The commissioners suggested that the experiment be tried first with the British Museum, the Natural History Museum, and—when artificial light is provided—with the Tate and National Galleries.

The idea in the mind of the investigators was simply that the museums were originally planned for the enjoyment of people of leisure and tourists, but that the working public is equally entitled to their benefits, and can receive them at no time except in the evenings. The commission also proposed that some of the art treasures of the large national museums should be sent around the country to small galleries, where they could be viewed by persons who would have no opportunity otherwise.

HISTORIC NEWS TRAVELS IN TWINKLE OF AN EYE

Dispatches Flashed From Antarctica Find Thin Copper Antenna Midst New York's Skyscrapers to Tell of Byrd's Triumph—Silence Hid Amundsen and Scott

RADIO has triumphed with the Byrd Antarctic Expedition. The vast, immeasurable tract of ether, that invisible odorless, tasteless substance believed to occupy all space, has afforded the explorers a fraction of a second contact with home and civilization.

Radio has carried cheer to Little America during the long, cold Winter that held them close to their base. They have tuned in the voices of friends and relatives 11,000 miles away through the Saturday night broadcasts from the short-wave transmitters associated with WGY at Schenectady and KDKA at Pittsburgh. They have heard melodies from Broadway. And up from the desolate regions news flashes direct to THE NEW YORK TIMES. Shot into space on short-wave lengths released by aerials held aloft by towers projecting skyward from the icy foundation, the dots and dashes have demonstrated the wonder of radio by finding a slender copper wire, which even the eye has a difficult task to discern, amid the skyscrapers in the Times Square area.

So accurate does radio find its mark that when Commander Byrd, Balchen, June and McKinley glided down the icy runway in the big gray plane Floyd Bennett, New York knew it before the argonauts were out of sight of their base camp. Within forty-five minutes THE TIMES was on the street with the story of the take-off. Before the plane had reached the South Pole the world was aware that the climax of a long year's work had been reached—the flight toward the goal had started.

A Boon to Exploration.

What a boon to exploration and news gathering is radio! Byrd flew to the Pole and back in 18 hours and 59 minutes. The radio transmitter was so adjusted, when messages were not being sent, that it whined to reassure those at Little America that all was well in the air, high above the mountains, glaciers and polar plateau.

There was no radio whine in the days of Amundsen, Scott and Shackleton to tell the world that all was well. Captain Roald Amundsen's dash of 1,738 miles to the South Pole and back in 1911-1912 took ninety-seven days. Captain Robert F. Scott's ill-fated expedition covered the long trek across the ice to the South Pole and back to within 155 miles of his base, a total of 1,545 miles in 148 days.

Amundsen and Scott were in the Antarctic at the same time. Yet they were not aware of their proximity at times. What if they had carried portable radio equipment on their sledges, as did those who established the outposts for Byrd. Amundsen had traveled about 225 miles back from the goal when apparently he passed Scott 135 miles away, pushing on in hope that he would be the first in the race to stand at the bottom of the earth.

Amundsen's base was at Framheim, 869 miles from the Pole, on the ice barrier at the Bay of Whales, not far from Little America. On Oct. 20, 1911, he began the long march to the Pole. Fifty-five days later he reached it, making an average daily speed of fifteen and a half miles. He spent four days at the Pole, making observations. Thirty-nine days later he was back in Framheim. This was on Jan. 25, 1912. He had no radio to tell the world that he had discovered the South Pole.

Captain Scott estimated that his base at Cape Evans was 850 miles from the Pole. He started on Nov. 2, 1911, with ponies, mules and dogs. On his way he passed motor sledges abandoned by advance parties. Fighting his way through blizzards, he arrived at the Pole on Jan. 18, 1912, having covered the 850 miles in seventy-seven days.

Captain Scott and his companions on their return trip were within 155 miles of their base at Cape Evans, when they were caught by a blizzard and perished, about March 29. No radio whine or message came out of the Antarctic in 1912 to break the silence that sealed Scott's fate.

London observers called attention to the fact that as stupendous as is the accomplishment of a flight of 1,560 miles over the frozen wastes to the South Pole and back in 18 hours and 59 minutes in itself, it has been brought home more vividly to the public mind by the fact that within a few hours of the plane's return to Little America leading newspapers throughout the world were enabled to tell the story of the exploit because of radio's magic and speed.

It took Robert E. Peary 153 days to push his way back from the North Pole to the northernmost telegraph station at Indian Harbor, Labrador, to notify THE NEW YORK TIMES that he had discovered the North Pole. This was in 1909, when wireless was much less powerful than it is today and too cumbersome to be carried on a long, hazardous trip across the ice-fields.

A World-Wide Laboratory.

But later on, in 1926, radio was sufficiently developed so that Byrd carried it on his flight across the top of the earth, as did the dirigible Norge, which sent to THE TIMES the first news dispatch to be published with a North Pole dateline. Three years later a message flashed up from the south carrying a South Pole date line.

The Antarctic is a vast radio laboratory in which observations of various ethereal phenomena can be made by tuning in and watching the action of broadcasts from all sections of the globe without interference from skyscrapers, electric wires and trees. Not only is THE TIMES short-wave station handling news but it is assisting and conducting tests of important radio research which the wireless men at Little America are making. They are conducting a thorough study of fading; of what wave lengths are best suited for reliable communication at different times of the day; of the effect of the Aurora Australis and of snow static; of the direction of radio wave travel; the effect of seasons on transmission and reception; why radio "goes dead"; radio echoes and their causes; the effect of the Heaviside Layer on radio, and more about ground waves and sky waves.

The discovery of the "extraordinary reliability" of radio as a means of communication is the outstanding contribution of Commander Byrd and his men to wireless, according to Dr. Alfred N. Goldsmith, vice president of the Radio Corporation of America.

Goldsmith Calls It Miracle.

"Byrd has demonstrated that radio is a necessity with regard to the factor of safety," said Dr. Goldsmith. "Byrd and his men have proved that radio is indispensable as a means of sending out news of discovery to readers throughout the world.

"The average reader would be rather surprised if in his morning paper he failed to see the story of what Byrd and his men did the night before in Antarctic" said Dr. Goldsmith. "It is a modern miracle accomplished. Communication between Little America and civilization has proved to be as perfect as the telephone which connects two neighbors. The radio report which told Commander Byrd that the weather at the mountain range was clear and good for flying spelled the difference between life and death to the adventurers who flew the perilous way to the South Pole and back."

"We are cooperating with several agencies, especially the United States Navy and THE NEW YORK TIMES, on a number of special tests which will help to solve some uncertainties of radio-wave travel through the polar zones. In itself the behavior of radio waves in these latitudes may seem of little practical value, but when it is realized that a great many of the radio routes in the civilized world on their great circle course pass near either of the earth's Poles the importance of these observations to the world's long-distance communication becomes apparent."

HIGH POWER RADIO SYSTEM IS PROPOSED FOR CANADA

Royal Commission After World-Wide Survey Recommends Seven 50,000-Watt Transmitters Established by Government-Owned and Financed Company

THE Royal Commission on radio broadcasting in Canada has made its report to the government and has made specific recommendations as to the future administration, management, control and financing of radio in the Dominion. The commission, in its study of broadcasting, visited London, Berlin, Paris, The Hague, Brussels, Geneva, Dublin, Belfast and New York before holding public sessions in twenty-five Canadian cities, including the capitals of nine Provinces.

"There has been unanimity on one fundamental question—Canadian listeners want Canadian broadcasting," said the commissioners. "This service is at present provided by stations owned by private enterprise and with the exception of two, owned by the government of Manitoba, are operated by the licensees for purposes of gain or for publicity in connection with the licensees' business. We believe that private enterprise is to be commended for its effort to provide entertainment for the benefit of the public with no direct return of revenue. This lack of revenue has, however, tended more and more to force too much advertising upon the listener. It also would appear to result in the crowding of stations into urban centres and the consequent duplication of services in such places, leaving other large populated areas ineffectively served.

Molding the Minds of Youth.

"The potentialities of broadcasting as an instrument of education have been impressed upon us," said the commissioners; "education in the broad sense, not only as it is conducted in the schools and colleges but in providing entertainment and of informing the public on questions of national interest. Many persons appearing before us have suggested that they would like to have an exchange of programs with the different parts of the country.

"At present the majority of programs heard are from sources outside of Canada. It has been emphasized to us that the continued reception of these has a tendency to mold the minds of the young people in the home to ideals and opinions that are not Canadian. In a country of the vast geographical dimensions of Canada, broadcasting will undoubtedly become a great force in fostering a national spirit and in interpreting national citizenship. The desired end might be achieved in several ways provided funds are available, viz.: (a) The establishment of one or more groups of stations operated by private enterprise in receipt of subsidy from the government. (b) The establishment and operation of stations by a government-owned and financed company. (c) The establishment and operation of stations by provincial governments.

"From what we have learned in our investigations," said the commissioners, "we are impelled to the conclusion that these interests can be adequately served only by some form of public ownership operation and control behind which is the national power and prestige of the whole public of the Dominion of Canada. The system which we propose does not fall within the exact category of any of those suggested above but is one which might be regarded as a modification of (b), i. e., the establishment and operation of stations by a government-owned and financed company.

"As a fundamental principle, we believe that any broadcasting organization must be operated on a basis of public service. We would like, therefore, to recommend the establishment of seven stations each having an aerial input of 50,000 watts; one station to be located suitably in each Province, except in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, where one station could be centrally located to serve these three Provinces. The proposed high-power stations could form the nucleus of the system and as each unit was brought into operation it could be ascertained what local areas, if any, were ineffectively served and stations of smaller power could be established to serve those places. We would also suggest that the high-power stations might be so designed as to permit, in time, an increase in power of an economic maximum and of being so modeled as ultimately to provide for two programs being broadcast simultaneously on different wave lengths.

"Cost of establishing stations in the proposed organization follows: The stations forming the system in the proposed organization should be well and fully equipped. The cost of installing the seven high-power units would probably approximate $3,000,000. There would, however, be considerable salvage value in the plants taken over. Assuming that four smaller stations, three 5,000-watt and one 500-watt, would be needed to furnish a supplementary service in local areas not effectively reached by the high-power units, an additional amount of possibly $225,000 would have to be spent in re-erecting apparatus taken over from present station owners. These expenses would represent a capital expenditure of $3,225,000.

"In addition to this, compensation would have to be paid to owners, of existing stations which we think should be met out of an appropriation made by Parliament," said the commissioners.

"Cost of operation: The service provided would necessarily have to be of a high order. A total annual expenditure for operation of the entire organization proposed, including supplementary stations, would seem to require a minimum of approximately $2,500,000. In addition, the question of interest on capital and sinking fund would have to be considered.

Sources of Revenue.

"Revenue: Various methods have been suggested to us as to how revenue might be raised fully to meet the cost of a broadcasting system. If the general public as a whole were listeners, there might be no just reason why the full cost of carrying on a broadcasting service could not be met out of an appropriation made by Parliament from public funds. It is conceivable that that time will come, but under existing conditions we would not feel justified in suggesting that the general public should be required to pay for the whole of the service which only those possessing radio receiving sets can enjoy. On the other hand, however, radio broadcasting is becoming more and more a public service, and in view of its educative value on broad lines and its importance as a medium for promoting national unity, it appears to us reasonable that a proportion of the expenses of the system should be met out of public funds.

"Three sources from which revenue could be derived are suggested, viz.: (1) License fees; (2) Rental of time on broadcasting stations for programs employing indirect advertising; (3) Subsidy from the Dominion Government."

A license fee of $1 is at present charged for a receiving license in Canada. Fifty per cent of all license fees collected in Manitoba is paid over to the government of that Province toward the maintenance of the provincial-owned broadcasting stations at Winnipeg and Brandon. With this exception, no contribution to the cost of broadcast programs in Canada is made from fees collected, which revert to the revenue fund of the Dominion Government.

PUCCINI'S "LA TOSCA" TO BE HEARD DEC. 21

"La Tosca," the second of the series of six Puccini operas to be broadcast, will be carried over a coast-to-coast network linked with WEAF at 7 o'clock on the night of Dec. 21. The cast that will interpret the leading rôles includes Mme. Frances Alda, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Pasquale Amato, baritone and Mario Chamlee, tenor.

Deems Taylor, the composer of "The King's Henchman," will act as musical narrator, linking together the various scenes of this condensed radio version of the Puccini work. Gennaro Papi will conduct.

The eighteenth annual appeal for the Hundred Neediest Cases is made today.

RADIO ZONE PLAN MEETS OPPOSITION

President Hoover Recommends Changes in Radio Law to Attain Utmost Service to the People Free of Competitive Tendencies

THERE is increasing opposition against the zone plan which now, according to law, divides the nation into five radio districts, each one represented by a member of the Federal Radio Commission.

President Hoover in his message to Congress recommended reorganization of the Radio Commission into a permanent body from its present temporary status. He said that the requirements of the present law that the commissioners shall be appointed from specified zones should be abolished and a general provision made for their equitable selection from different parts of the country. Mr. Hoover pointed out that despite the effort of the commissioners, the present method develops a public insistence that the commissioners are specially charged with supervision of radio affairs in the zone from which each is appointed.

"As a result," said President Hoover, "there is a danger that the system will degenerate from a national system into five regional agencies with varying practices, varying policies, competitive tendencies and consequent failure to attain its utmost capacity for service to the people as a whole."

Although the Davis equalization amendment to the radio law provides for the equal distribution of radio broadcasting facilities among the five zones and States, based on population, the Middle Western, or Fourth Zone, is far in advance of the other areas in the number of stations. It surpasses the other zones in the amount of broadcasting power.

New York State Leads.

Figures released last week by the Federal Radio Commission at the request of the Senate, which before its special session adjournment asked a detailed analysis of the broadcasting set-up, show that the Fourth Zone has 152 stations while the First, or Eastern Zone, has only 117 broadcasting units. The former group of stations uses 325,265 watts of power, while the latter has 307,225 watts. The Fourth Zone has lost three stations within the last year, however, while the First has gained six.

New York State, with fifty-two stations, leads all other States in the number of transmitters, but it is surpassed by Illinois in the amount of power, the figures being 166,815 and 213,250, respectively. The next States in order are California, with forty-five stations and Illinois with thirty-nine.

Fewer Stations on the Air.

The table which gives figures for Sept. 20, 1928, and Nov. 20, this year, shows that many of the States and zones have suffered the loss of several stations, indicating the weeding out of some of the more undesirable stations since the general reallocation. For instance, the Second Zone, which includes Judge Ira E. Robinson's home State of West Virginia, has only 96 stations today whereas a year ago it had 104. The Fifth, or extreme western zone, had 127 stations in 1928, but only 124 now. The State of Pennsylvania has lost 5 stations alone.

Delaware and Wyoming are the States of lowest quota in broadcasting. Each has one broadcasting station, the former State with one of 350 watts and Wyoming with one of 500 watts.

"The aggregate power is not a fair method of determining a State's quota," said Commissioner Harold A. Lafount, who prepared the tabulation, "since many stations are required to divide time. Some 5-kilowatt stations operate as little as one-seventh time. It is, therefore, possible that seven stations may actually render no more service in one State than one full-time station in another."

Since the reallocation, the commissioner pointed out, "the actual number of stations has not been materially reduced, but by requiring them to divide time the actual number operating simultaneously at night has been materially reduced."

RADIO MUSIC COMPANY AIMS BLOW AT JAZZ

A MOVEMENT to put jazz music in the background of the American musical picture is the aim of the recent alliance between two nationally known music publishing houses and the National Broadcasting Company. The music publishers concerned in the combination are Carl Fisher, Inc., and Leo Feist, Inc. The name of the new organization is the Radio Music Company.

"We have had perhaps too much jazz," E. C. Mills, president of the company, said, "and as there is no denying the influence of music upon the trend of the people's inclinations, it seems about time for some one to assume leadership in a movement away from the cacophony of most music of the day."

OLD CITY ORDINANCE FROWNS ON RADIO

An old city ordinance has been resurrected in Chicago to threaten shops and stores that permit loud-speakers to bellow forth upon streets at all hours of the day and night. The old law, dug up by an assistant corporation counsel, was passed in the days before radio, but it places loud-speakers, when they advertise merchandise, in the same category as the human voice that calls "Old rags, old iron."

The city attorney rules that the storekeeper who permits a loud-speaker to broadcast the merits of any merchandise will be liable to a fine of from $2 to $50 every time the article is mentioned.

The only escape is to shut off the radio the minute the advertising sponsor is mentioned or to place the loud-speaker in an alley and operate it between 11 A. M. and 6 P. M.

Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, on WEAF's Network Tomorrow at 9:30 P. M.

DETROIT SYMPHONY IN NATION-WIDE CONCERT

THE Detroit Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Ossip Gabrilowitsch, will be heard in its first coast-to-coast broadcast tomorrow night at 9:30 o'clock over stations linked with WEAF. Mr. Gabrilowitsch, who will make his radio début as a pianist, has selected Schumann's concerto for piano and orchestra as his solo.

"It is a program of great music which should appeal to all classes of people," he said. "Schumann's concerto in A minor should be particularly appealing over the air because of its beautiful rhythmic qualities—the same qualities which critics of three-quarters of a century ago said 'bristle with conceits and eccentricities which belong so disagreeably to the new school now struggling for existence in German.'"

The broadcast will be made from the New York studios, where the night following the Detroit Orchestra, with Mr. Gabrilowitsch conducting, will give a concert for the benefit of a New York hospital. Mr. Gabrilowitsch, who was born in Petrograd, gave his first recital in New York twenty-nine years ago. He became conductor of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra in 1918, nine years after his marriage to Clara Clemens, the daughter of Mark Twain. His musical education began in the Petrograd Conservatory of Music, where he came under the personal supervision of Anton Rubinstein. He made his début in Berlin in 1896.

Overture to "Rosamunde".....Schubert
Concerto for piano and orchestra in A minor.....Schumann
Intermezzo-Andantino Grazioso.
Allegro Vivace.
Mr. Gabrilowitsch.
Valse Triste.....Sibelius
Rumanian Rhapsody No. 1.....Enesco
Symphonic poem, "Les Preludes".....Liszt

WATERLOO JOINS NETWORK.

Station WMT, Waterloo, Iowa, has been added permanently to the Columbia Broadcasting System network. The station operates with a power of 500 watts on a frequency of 600 kilocycles.

LISTENING-IN ON THE RADIO

Drama "Joan of Arc" to Be Repeated on Tuesday Night—Other Events Scheduled for Broadcasting This Week

A RADIO drama, Joan of Arc, repeated upon the request of listeners who tuned in on the performance a year ago, will be broadcast on Tuesday night at 9 o'clock over WEAF's nation-wide network. Rosaline Greene will play the leading rôle. The incidental music will be played by an orchestra under the direction of Nathaniel Shilkret.

A series of broadcasts by the American Orchestral Society will be inaugurated with a classical program to be heard Tuesday afternoon at 3 o'clock over WEAF'S network. The orchestra will play in Carnegie Hall, with Chalmers Clifton conducting.

Gustave Haenschen directs the ensemble through what is booked as "a fast-moving radio spectacle," presenting Olive Palmer, soprano; Elizabeth Lennox, contralto; Paul Oliver, tenor; The Revelers, male quartet, and an orchestra, over WEAF's coast-to-coast system, Wednesday night at 9:30 o'clock.

The program details follow:

Chinatown, ensemble; My Imagination, soprano and tenor duet; Me for You, orchestra; Chant of the Jungle, The Revelers; Chanson de Baiser, Olive Palmer, soprano; Mardi Gras, from "Mississippi Suite," orchestra; I'll Sing Thee Songs of Araby, Paul Oliver, tenor; Blue Waters, The Revelers; every Moon's a Honeymoon, orchestra; Friml Melodies, ensemble; A Fairy Story by the Fire, Olive Palmer, soprano; At Twilight, orchestra; Just a Memory, Paul Oliver, tenor; Moonlight on the Ganges, The Revelers; On Miami Shore, soprano and contralto duet; Melancholy, orchestra; selection from "The Desert Song," ensemble.

This year, Czechoslovakia is celebrating the thousandth anniversary of the death of its national patron saint, King Wenceslaus, and for this reason, Rupert Sircom has chosen St. Vitus Cathedral, Prague, for his Cathedral Saga program to be sent out over WOR at 6 o'clock this evening.

Sonata in A minor (Allegro, Arioso, Presto).....Benda
Fuga.....Vanhal
Ukloza.....Tomasek
Largo, from the New World Symphony.....Dvorak
Chorale Prelude, "Rejoice, Beloved Christians".....Bach

Allegretto, from "The Seventh Symphony".....Beethoven
Concertstucke (for piano and orchestra).....Weber
Piano soloist, Harry Watts.
Malaguena, from "Boabdil".....Moszkowski

Music ranging from the popular melodies heard in the show "Paris" to a Grieg selection will be offered by an orchestera under the direction of Andy Sannella in the broadcast through WEAF's coast-to-coast system, Wednesday night at 9 o'clock. The "Old Counsellor," financial authority, will talk during the broadcast.

The musical program follows:

Selections from "Rose of Algeria".....Herbert
Medley from "Paris".....Ward
I Sing All My Love Songs to You.....Ingraham
All That I'm Asking Is Sympathy.....Davis
Southern Skies.....McLeod
Huldigungsmarsch (Triumphal March), from "Sigurd Jorsalfar".....Grieg

Massenet's "Meditation" from "Thais," played as a violin solo by Eugene Ormandy with a harp accompaniment by Steffy Goldner, is listed as a feature of the Melody Moments to be broadcast on Thursday night at 9:30 o'clock over WEAF's network.

Vocal and instrumental interludes add color to a program leaning toward the classical which Harry Horlick and his Gypsies will broadcast tomorrow night at 8:30 o'clock.

The program follows:

March Mignonne.....Poldini
Mystery of the Night.....Denni
Believe Me If All Those Endearing Young Charms.....Old English
Oliver Smith, tenor.
Wedding of the Winds.....Hall
Flapperetta.
Piano duet.
Two Guitars.....Horlick

OLD GLEE CLUB GOES ON THE AIR

Mendelssohn Choral Group Will Give First Public Concert Since Organization Was Founded in 1867

THE Mendelssohn Club of New York will be heard in its first public concert since its organization in 1867 in the broadcast over WEAF's network on Wednesday night at 8:30 o'clock. Ralph L. Baldwin will direct the male chorus during the program. Black's Orchestra will accompany the chorus during the singing of "Adeste Fidelis."

In the sixty-two years since the Mendelssohn Club was formed in 1867 by a group of New York men interested in the development of male choral music, its affairs have been private, invitations being extended only to a comparatively few friends of the sixty members. The recognition that radio is the most accessible medium for fine music reaching the greatest audience at one time caused the members to agree to broadcast.

Music by conductors and members of the club, both past and present, will be included among the nine numbers scheduled to be broadcast. The first of these is "Morning" by Oley Speaks, a contemporary member, who also wrote the music for Kipling's "The Road to Mandalay." Another is the "Shepherd's Story," the music for which was written by Clarence Dickinson, the Mendelssohn Club's conductor from 1909 to 1913. For its closing song the club will sing "Adeste Fidelis," for which Mr. Baldwin made a special vocal and orchestral arrangement of the old air. As a tribute to Edward A. MacDowell, the club's third conductor, the orchestra will play his "Witches Dance."

Many of America's foremost singers, composers and conductors have been members of the club. Its first conductor, Joseph Mosenthal, who served from 1867 until he died in 1896, wrote the music for William Cullen Bryant's "Thanatopsis." MacDowell wrote many songs for the Mendelssohn Club, including "The Crusaders," which critics acclaimed the finest male chorus he ever wrote. MacDowell was conductor from 1896 to 1898, and after he died the members learned that he had frequently written for them under the name of Edgar Thorne. Among other composers who have written for the organization was Frederick Clay, famous British musician, whose "St. Christopher" was first sung by the club in the early '70s.

The program includes:

Awake My Love ..... Gericke
All Through the Night ..... Welsh Air
Hundred Pipers ..... Scottish Air
Summer Evening ..... Palmgren
Morning ..... Speaks
Glee Club.
Witches Dance ..... MacDowell
Orchestra.
The Sleigh ..... Kountz
Shepherd's Story ..... Dickinson

Adeste Fidelis ..... Old Air
Glee Club with orchestra.

Ralph N. Baldwin Will Lead the Mendelssohn Glee Club When the Singers Make Their Radio Debut Wednesday Night at 8:30 o'Clock Over WEAF's Chain.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

Is Price Cutting Expected After the Holidays?—Overproduction Rather Than the Stock Market Is Responsible for Radio Industry's Problem

By ORRIN E. DUNLAP, JR.

QUESTION.—I want to buy a new radio set for Christmas. I have my eye on two sets that will fill the bill all right, but I do not want to get the set and then see a general slashing of prices right after the holidays nor do I want to see a lot of new instruments come on the market as soon as I have the set installed. Do you think it is safe for me to buy, or shall I wait? J. S. ANSWER.—Inquiry among leading radio manufacturers indicates that production schedules are now well in hand. Some who have been going ahead too fast have curtailed production so that dealers would not have excess inventory at the year end. Usually the production of radio sets is curtailed about Dec. 10 because by that date the Christmas demand is supplied. Several manufacturers reduced production several weeks earlier this year so it is not expected that leading manufacturers who have maintained production schedules in keeping with the demand will have any great supply of sets at sale prices. Retail sales of radio equipment increased 14 per cent in the third quarter of 1929, compared with 1928, according to the Department of Commerce, while Radio Retailing estimates that sales so far this year are 35 per cent of last year. It is estimated that 4,000,000 radio sets will be sold in 1929. Some sets may sell at lower prices after Jan. 1. However, this will not be true in all cases by any means. Several manufacturers who reduced prices several weeks ago report that the move increased sales and they do not anticipate that dealers will be overstocked after Jan. 1. No new models are expected until the radio trade show in June at Atlantic City. The majority of manufacturers are optimistic as far as Christmas business is concerned. The set builders who have overproduced have learned their lesson and as a result the radio industry will be in a much healthier condition from now on.

QUESTION.—I own an alternating current receiver which works well except that there is a constant hum on all stations, which, I am told, is an A C line hum. Is there any way to eliminate this nuisance? V. B. ANSWER.—Try a new 227 detector tube in the detector soc

PLANES IN TROPICS USE NOVEL SETS

Engineers Design Dampness-Proof Receivers—Innovations Assure Communication From Aircraft Over Gulf and Caribbean

DIMINUTIVE radio transmitters and screen-grid receivers, which comprise light and efficient communication units for airplane installation, are being installed on all the airplanes in the fleet of the Pan American Airways, Inc., the routes of which lay between Miami, Fla., the Caribbean Islands, Mexico, Panama and South America. One complete airplane transmitter and receiver, with tubes, and the wind-driven electrical generator which supplies power, weighs forty-two pounds.

H. C. Leuteritz, communications chief of the system, designed the installations after making exhaustive tests in the air over tropical latitudes with all types of commercially available sets.

Service For Passengers

"The reliability of the short-wave communication system," said Mr. Leuteritz, "can easily be seen from the fact that for many months there has been no instance of failure of land stations of the system to keep in constant touch with every plane in flight. An instance of how well the system operates is cited as follows:

"A passenger was supposed to be on one of the planes which was then in flight between Port au Prince and Santo Domingo. We were asked to find out if he was flying anywhere along the air routes. In little more than two hours a reply direct from the plane reported that the man in question was not on board. The request went from New York to Miami, where it was relayed to the airship by the short-wave system. The reply followed the same route.

"During the recent storm period in the sub-tropics radio communication made it possible for the airplanes to avoid the storm entirely. Contact with the land stations was continuous. The exact position and condition of every ship was reported at intervals of not more than ten minutes.

"During the first of the tests made by the engineers to evolve suitable aircraft radio sets it was discovered that corrosion of every exposed metal part was a factor to be seriously considered," Mr. Leuteritz said. "The prevailing semi-tropical conditions caused the fine wires in transformers and resistances to corrode and become inoperative in a short while. The damp atmosphere, permeating every crack and crevice of the instruments, sooner or later caused trouble.

"Transmitter and receiver parts of the new apparatus, every exposed metallic part about the installation, is coated with a fine layer of bakelite, baked on. No metal is exposed to the air. Every wire and coil is similarly covered. A complete installation was immersed in water for test purposes, after which it operated normally. Vibration was a source of trouble. The airplane motor vibration literally shook apart some of the first models tried out."

"We found ourselves continually patching up the early commercial models under test. Six of the installations were kept in service in ships by taking parts from more than two dozen others which had failed for some cause or other in service," said Mr. Leuteritz.

The transmitter has two vacuum tubes of the 210 type. The receiver has four tubes, two of which are of the screen-grid variety. Each unit is operated by the radio man of the airplane. The antenna used is a wire suspended from the wing ends aft to the fusilage of the ship in a "V" formation. Communication is effected throughout entire trips without any adjustment of the receiver, according to Mr. Leuteritz. The receivers and transmitters are adjusted to the waves to be used before the flight begins and rarely has to be readjusted in flight. In the system are seventy-five land radio stations which direct the planes in flight through communication and direction finders.

WENR'S MUSIC LOUD THROUGHOUT THE EAST

SOUNDING as if it were using its authorized assignment of 50,000 watts, WENR of Chicago has been heard in the East very satisfactorily of late. For those who are not familiar with the station, a good feature to try it out on would be the symphony orchestra program beginning at 10 o'clock Eastern Standard Time on Sunday nights.

Station WENR, which expects soon to move into its new quarters in the top floors of the Chicago Grand Opera House, where it will have one of the most luxurious homes of any station in the United States, alternates broadcasting on a frequency of 870 kilocycles with WLS, Chicago.

ALL-FRENCH CONCERT ENDS CURRENT STOKOWSKI SERIES

Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra on the Air This Afternoon in Final Broadcast Until Next Autumn

A WHOLE century of musical brilliance," according to a representative of WEAF, will be represented this afternoon at 5:30 o'clock, when Leopold Stokowski, conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra, concludes his special series with the following all-French program:

Hungarian March from "The Damnation of Faust".....Berlioz
Symphony in D Minor (3 movements).
1. Lento; Allegro non troppo.
2. Allegretto.
3. Allegro non troppo.....Franck
Nocturne "Festivities".....Debussy

"I hope to broadcast frequently," said Stokowski when asked as to the possibility of further radio concerts. "Some day I hope to broadcast a program of the best music created in America in our time."

He pointed out that he had, in his current series, endeavored to illustrate past and present compositions of three great national schools: First, the Teutonic, with Bach, Mozart and Wagner numbers, Oct. 6; second, the Slavic, with compositions by Moussorgsky, Stravinsky and Rimsky-Korsakof, Nov. 3; finally the Latin or Gallic school, Dec. 8, with compositions by Debussy, Franck and Belioz. Thus, he felt, he had paved the way for the American program, which should come some time during 1930.

Once more Stokowski stressed the democratizing force of radio in expressing approval of thousands of letters which have been written by radio fans about his first series. In a musical way, he maintained, the radio will serve as a sort of daily newspaper. The paper, said Stokowski, costs the tramp and the millionaire the same price, and, assuming the willingness to read, each may take from its pages the information of the day. There is a parallel today in the realm of music, he asserted, pointing out that radio has taken fine music out of the class of a rich man's plaything and made it the property of the masses as well. The harvest that the United States, as a nation, will reap from this wholesale musical enlightenment, Stokowski added, will be gaining a position of premier importance in the world of music.

While information as to Stokowski's next radio series will doubtless be withheld until after the first of the year, it is known that there is every probability he will go on the air following his usual Summer vacation trip to Europe. This would mean that he would, once more, be one of the stellar attractions of the Fall season of 1930.

A Washington office is soon to be opened by the National Association of Broadcasters, present headquarters of which are in New York.

The eighteenth annual appeal for the Hundred Neediest Cases is made today.

STATION WAR FOLLOWS SHIP AROUND GLOBE

A NEW radio distance and constancy mark has been set by the War Department radio net. For the first time in history, constant communication has been kept between a stable station and a ship traveling around the world.

Daily contacts were made between the transport Dellwood and Station WAR, Washington, on its trip from Seattle, Wash., to Manila, P. I., by way of the Panama and Suez Canals this month.

It is estimated that a saving of about $500 was effected by the handling of messages to and from the vessel by the War Department station.

SOUTH DAKOTA TO HAVE SETS IN ALL SCHOOLS

PLANS are under way to install radio sets in all the 5,000 schools in South Dakota within the next two years, with a regular semi-weekly broadcast by the State department of education as part of the regular educational program, according to Quinton Adams, vice president of the Radio Victor Corporation. He said that thirty schools in the United States have installed within the last few months built-in centralized radio apparatus for distribution of educational programs to classrooms and that between sixty and seventy other schools are planning similar installations.

GIFFORD TO SPEAK.

Walter S. Gifford, president of the American Telephone and Telegraph Company, has been invited to speak on "Prosperity" at the twenty-fifth annual dinner of the Chicago Association of Commerce, to be held on Thursday night at the Palmer House. Broadcasting is scheduled to begin at 8:30 o'clock over WABC.

FEW actors in the history of the American theatre appeared in so great a number of tremendous personal successes as did David Warfield in "The Music Master", "The Auctioneer", "The Grand Army Man", "The Return of Peter Grimm" and as "Shylock" in "The Merchant of Venice".

Now, in his beautiful New York apartment overlooking Central Park, amid his magnificent collection of art treasures, among which are included some of the finest paintings of Corot, Botticelli, Daubigny, Sargent, and Rousseau, "The Music Master" spends many enjoyable hours before his Stromberg-Carlson Radio . . . . now it is a concert by the New York Symphony; again, Graham Mac Namee reporting a famous sporting event, President Hoover, or Ramsay MacDonald.

With that discriminating taste that has served him so well in the selection of his paintings, silver, old glass, rare altar cloths, velvets and tapestries, Mr. Warfield purchased a Stromberg-Carlson.

NEW YORK'S 100 NEEDIEST CASES

EIGHTEENTH ANNUAL APPEAL

OVER 16,000 PERSONS HELPED BY THE FUND

SINCE its beginning in 1912, the fund for the Hundred Neediest Cases has grown more than ninety-fold. Since 1916 contributions have been so generous that more than 200 cases have been cared for each year; and yearly there has been an increase in the number of cases relieved. Last year, in addition to the original hundred, 369 other cases were helped—each of them an outstanding instance of distress. In the seventeen years of the fund's existence, about 4,000 cases—more than 16,000 individuals—have been assisted. Here is the record:

1913	9,646.36
1914	15,032.46
1915	31,819.92
1916	55,792.45
1917	62,103.47
1918	81,097.57
1919	106,967.14
1920	111,126.00
1921	125,011.10
1922	157,421.08
1923	177,683.67
1924	233,524.89
1925	260,998.26
1926	280,287.78
1927	285,834.35
1928	338,111.01

EVERY DOLLAR GIVEN GOES TO THE NEEDIEST

EVERY cent contributed to the fund for the Hundred Neediest Cases goes to those in want. There is no deduction for office or administrative work.

No solicitation for the fund is authorized. The only appeal made is in the publication of the cases.

Checks should be made payable to the "Hundred Neediest Cases Fund" and mailed to The New York Times, Times Square; to any of the branch offices of The Times; or to any of the following nine organizations presenting the cases:

The New York Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor
105 East Twenty-second Street.

The Charity Organization Society
105 East Twenty-second Street.

The State Charities Aid Association
105 East Twenty-second Street.

ON these pages are told today a hundred stories of human want and human struggle—of want that is the greatest in all the city; of struggle against circumstances such as might befall any of us. Here are a hundred true records of human tragedy: facts, set down without embellishment, which speak eloquently for themselves.

These are the stories of New York's One Hundred Neediest Cases; for them, as Christmas time approaches, the eighteenth annual appeal is made. To those who respond there comes a double joy: the satisfaction of having given where the gift means most, and the thrill of having lifted a fellow-man out of his distress.

The Hundred Neediest are not mendicants. They are hard-working men and women who have failed as any one might fail because of illness and the hazard of fortune. And they are—many of them—children. Their needs are amply authenticated. Nine leading philanthropic societies have certified these cases as those which are the most deeply in want. The societies stand ready to administer funds for them without any deduction whatever for overhead or administrative charges. Thus every penny contributed to the Neediest goes direct to them.

A principle that guides the administration of the fund is that the relief shall be more than temporary. In each case the amount asked is that required to carry the recipients of aid over their period of distress to a happier time when they will be able to stand alone and fight their own battles, as they have fought them before.

The anonymity of the Neediest is fully safeguarded. Those for whom help is asked do not know that their cases have been included in the appeal; those who give do not know whom they are aiding.

Gifts Are Purely Voluntary.

The giving is purely voluntary. No solicitations are authorized; the only appeal made is the publication of the cases themselves.

Every year since the fund was inaugurated the giving has increased. In the first year it totaled $3,630.88, and last year it had grown to $388,111.01. It is hoped this year that the record of increase will be maintained.

Many donors have listed the Hundred Neediest fund as their special philanthropy and send in their checks year after year. Among the contributors are children whose parents have found in the Neediest Cases a striking opportunity for teaching lessons in giving. Many gifts are sent anonymously; many in memory of some one who was dear to the giver. Some of the earlier donors have established trust funds in order that, after their deaths, their aid to the Neediest might continue.

Checks should be made payable to the "Hundred Neediest Cases Fund" and mailed to The New York Times, Times Square; to any of the branch offices of The Times; or to any of the nine organizations presenting the cases. These organizations are listed at the head of the last column on this page.

Another Child Is Always Chosen.

Persons looking for a little girl to adopt want Carol at once when they see her. Then they must be told about her heart, which may stop, abruptly, some day. They hesitate. Just seeing Carol and hearing her talk, they know she is the sort of child who would get a hold on their affections. Her death would be dreadful. Invariably they decide they could not bear to live in constant fear of it. They want a child to make them happy, not miserable. They turn away from her and take some other little girl instead. It seems unlikely that Carol can ever in this world find a home and some one to call father or mother. As her tenth Christmas approaches, she is beginning to lose hope. There is still one chance. Special medical care may make things right.

Amount needed, $450.

Wooden Giraffes for Firewood.

For four generations in New York the men of the van D. family have been cabinetmakers, who supported large families happily until their daughters were married and their sons were trained to carry on the craft. Thomas van D. had six children with sound minds and healthy bodies, and everything was going according to family tradition when he fell ill. Jeanette was 14, Robert 11, Samuel 8, Rose and Violet (the twins) 3 and James 1. They moved into a few damp rooms on the ground floor, chosen because they were the cheapest that could be found, even in a district of poor housing. The only funds of the family are earned by Mrs. van D., who has found work as a cleaner in public buildings. The father cannot work for months to come. He can only sit at home and watch his children growing thinner and losing more time out of school because they have no shoes. The only light in their dark rooms is an oil lamp. For heat they burn wooden boxes given free by a shopkeeper, who says, "Van D. has the finest bunch of kids I ever saw." In this dismal situation, the father restlessly whittles rabbits and giraffes for his children from the wood they bring in. Often the children have to burn their rabbits and giraffes to keep warm. The rent has run so far overdue that they are now threatened with eviction.

Amount needed, $900.

CASE 3.

"I Was Helped When I Was Young."

Katherine M., at 45, explains her years of hard work, long hours and small salary in the laundry. When she was a child she was deserted by her father, but was helped by her aunt, at a time when she could not help herself. Her feeling that it was her simple duty to return the care once given to her carried her on until she was so ill and tired that at last she had to ask for help. "I was helped when I was young," she said. She cut her food down in order to have enough for the aunt, who is 71 and who sits in the dimness of half-blindness telling visitors proudly what a good girl Katherine is. Unless help now comes from others, these two face hunger and separation.

Amount needed, $760.

CASE 4.

They Were Living on Tea and Bread.

Once Mr. B. was a baker, and his wife and children all had plenty of good food. Then three years of an illness known as "Berger's disease" used up his savings, and finally cost him his leg. While he was in the hospital his furniture was sold, piece by piece. His children—there are four, including a baby—were wearing rags. Their shoes could no longer be patched. In the house, the three who could walk found it more comfortable to go barefoot. When Mr. B. came home on crutches, he hobbled right out again and found work at $5 a week, so that he could help his wife, who had done the best she could. The baby alone was content. No matter what hardships the rest of the family endured, they always provided milk for him, so that he would be well nourished, as they had been when they were babies. His robust body and plump cheeks were in contrast to the appearance of the half-starved family about him. The rent ran overdue. At last all except the baby were living on tea and bread. They knew they were at the end when the oldest child, Shirley, who is 12, returned from the grocery store weeping. She said the man behind the counter had shouted in front of other people that she was asking for food without money.

Amount needed, $750.

She Scrubbed Though She Was Ill.

Mrs. H. energetically went out to work eight years ago when her husband deserted her and their two small daughters. She scrubbed for so many hours a day that she was able to maintain a home for her children. She did not give up even though the work brought on kidney trouble. Elinor is now 17 and Jean is 15, and both are beginning to earn. But alone they do not earn enough, and the mother's pains have grown so much worse that now she is not able to do any scrubbing at all. Unless they are helped, the home which their mother held together for eight years by unceasing toil will be broken up.

CASE 6.

No One Wants an Old Music Teacher.

Miss Hilda K. was educated in a music school that is internationally famous, but now that she is 69 music students find her method old-fashioned. She has offered her services to boarding schools if they would only give her board and a room in exchange for teaching. She has no relatives living. Even the opportunity to play occasionally for hire at parties has been diminished by the radio. The only place where her services are now accepted is in her local church, where, as she has done all her life, she offers them as her contribution to charity. The few pupils she now finds no longer pay enough to meet even her meager needs. She can no longer read the music she sets before them, but she has memorized it. She hopes only that they will not notice how stiff her fingers have grown, for she is too old to undertake other work now. She is not only left behind by the present but also cut off from the past; she has sold the old family possessions and bits of jewelry that kept alive memories of her mother and sister. Help is needed to tide her over the Winter.

CASE 7.

He Worked as Long as He Could.

Mr. M. was a small, frail man, but he worked every day in a wholesale grocery, moving heavy crates and boxes, though he felt increasingly ill and weary each night. A wife and four small children depended on his earnings. One day he found he could not lift another box. He went to the hospital. The doctor told him he had cancer. His wife went to work immediately and now earns enough by cleaning to pay for the children's food, but not for rent or clothes or doctor's bills. The oldest child, William, who is 11, is delicate and needs special food and doctor's care. Betty, who is 6, is just recovering from diphtheria. The other children are Charles, 8, and Allan, 3. The mother, who is only 29, manages to be cheerful. She keeps her house spotless and tells her children things will be all right when their father can work again. The doctor is not sure that he ever will. He weighed only eighty-nine pounds the day he first went to the hospital.

CASE 8.

Victims of Racketeers.

Furtive men began to slip in and out of Frank's home, and his wife heard disputes and threats. At dawn one morning, when Frank was out, a policeman came for her. She reached the hospital in time to see her husband breathe his last. The police told her of a roadhouse meeting, a quarrel and a volley of shots that left her husband and another man on the floor. They explained to her that he had tried to get into a racket such as she had read about, where gangsters make easy money. She understood for the first time why, in the past two years, funds had been so plentiful and life so smooth for her and the five children. She is only 26, but during the year that has elapsed she has worked herself into complete exhaustion in caring for the five children, Caroline 8, Annie 7, Sarah 6, Jennie 4 and Dora 2, who are equally innocent of their father's adventure. Funds will enable this family to go on.

"A Boy of 15 Might Mind Dying."

Thomas, 15, watches his mother anxiously from the bed where the doctor told him he must lie quiet if he wants to get well. He knows his mother is struggling alone to provide food for him; and he knows that her smiles have become rarer. He does not know that she cannot get the special food that she needs for herself because she has diabetes. And he does not know the doctor told her his heart has not long to go. As he lies in bed and talks of the future in which he will, he thinks, run again in the streets and grow up to earn plenty of food for both, his mother tries to smile at him. "I wouldn't want him to suspect," she explained. "For me to die doesn't mean much, but a boy of 15 might mind dying."

Jed Needs a Parent.

The 20 cents had to buy food for Jed and his mother. His father, who was away, sent it as their Christmas money. It was in stamps; and Jed remembers walking through the snow, without an overcoat, for blocks past grocery shops swollen with Christmas trees, to find a grocer who had not already refused them credit. He was afraid no one would take stamps for food. That was Christmas two years ago. Last year, as Christmas approached, Jed's mother turned on the gas in the tenement kitchen and died. Briefly his father reappeared—a vague, distraught man who had lost his health and spirit in the war that ended before Jed was born. He brought Jed to the charity association, saying he wanted to give him up, if possible, before Christmas. Jed is now 10—a thin pale boy whose teachers say he has exceptional mechanical aptitude. He needs food, shelter and clothing and a chance to play baseball for the first time in his life.

They Want to Remain Together.

Mary B. and her elder sister, Kate, were both domestic cooks. For a generation they prepared savory meals and enjoyed a cook's share in them. The salaries they received were never very large, and they were unable to save a great deal against the time when they would no longer be able to work. The time came and they had a little. One day they received and carefully read a glittering piece of advertising that came from a broker. They thought him a friend when he explained to them how the little could be invested so that they would have much more. They gave him their money and he disappeared with every cent of it. He cannot be traced. Mary is 66, and Kate, who is 81, is an invalid. Funds will keep them together.

WHAT HELP MEANS TO THE NEEDY

THE good done for the Neediest through last year's fund indicates what can be achieved this year. Long after Christmas was forgotten by those who contributed in 1928, the Needy could remember it by what contributions accomplished for them.

In last year's Case 63, for instance, the distorted life of 5-year-old Frankie has since been restored to normal. When the case was published Frankie had just been taken from a home life in which he was so badly treated that he feared all grown-ups. The Neediest Fund enabled the charity society to put him to board with a good motherly woman until he should be fit for adoption. He thawed slowly. Once he got lost and it took him days to recover from his terror. Two months ago, however, his teacher reported him at the head of his class. Well nourished and cared for, he had grown attractive, and he smiled readily at grown-ups. Two weeks ago he was adopted by a couple who report that he is "an adorable child."

Last year's Case 54 is another illustration. Alec M., a skilled worker, was too proud to ask help, although tuberculosis was undermining his ability to support his family. At the time the case was published, he had been found, with his wife and two little girls, homeless and penniless, sleeping on the floor in a neighbor's kitchen. Although the doctors said he then had only a fighting chance of recovery the fund brought him new determination and he predicted that he would soon be able to leave the sanitarium to which, with help, he was able to go. He promised that he would soon be back again at work. His wife and the two children were moved into three rooms with a little yard where the children could play. Their malnutrition was corrected and they seemed to blossom under good home care. Mrs. M.'s cheerful letters brought her husband out of the sanitarium so early that the doctors warned him not to overdo. He found work immediately, however, and he shows no ill effects in his periodical visits to the tuberculosis clinic. That all means that the family is, as M., himself, says, "completely on its own again."

The harassed young man in last year's Case 23, with heart trouble and rheumatism, with a wife who was run down and anemic and with a delicate six months' old baby, has found his way to go on. His worries have been lifted, and he has had proper food and some rest. The delicate baby has grown healthy; and, during the past six months, the young husband and his wife have grown strong enough to find work again. Once a month they go together to the bank and add a few dollars to the savings account they have started.

These cases are typical. In many instances the immediate result of the Neediest Fund was to give a feeling of encouragement which seemed to act like a tonic on the sick and despairing. The new sense of security aid gave did not prove an illusion, and last year's Hundred are no longer the Neediest.

The Neediest whose cases are reported today are just as deserving and just as helpless as the Neediest last year. In the same way they can be restored.

years, living in one room in an old frame house, she built up a fund to give Selma a proper education. Selma, past 12, was exceptionally intelligent and was in the rapid advancement class in school when Mrs. W. fell ill. The college fund had to be spent for doctors and food. Mrs. W. and Selma tried to hide their distress, but the grocer, who had noticed them among his steady customers, was watching their buying dwindle to the danger point. A grocer in that poverty-stricken neighborhood knows a great deal about distress. It was he who quietly sent the charity worker, who found this mother and daughter slowly starving. They need food and help with the rent.

A Girl, 15, Is the Support of Eight.

When the doctors sent Mr. F. home from the hospital, they said he would never be able to work again. His employer, who had held his job open because F. had a wife and six children, filled it. The family crowded into a sunless flat in a dilapidated tenement. White paint there was gray and peeling. Most of the wall paper was hanging in soiled tatters from the walls. When they first moved into the place, the children whispered instead of talking. Mr. F., tall, gaunt, with deep hollows under his eyes and hair prematurely white—he was only 45—had nothing further to say. Mrs. F., his wife, a slim woman of 37, took command of their family. Judith, the oldest child, who is like her mother, left school to work as a clerk at $12 a week, although she was barely 15. Esther, who was 12, helped with the housework after school and was able to mother the rest of the children. Herbert was 10, John 7, Edward 3, and Sara 2. Mrs. F. attempted so much immediately that her health was impaired. The support of a sick mother, a dying father and their six children now depends entirely on a 15-year-old girl. She needs help in keeping the family together.

"I Will Not Give Up My Children."

When her husband ran away, Mrs. D., at the age of 26, said she wanted above everything else in the world to rear her four young children. She went to work in a laundry and placed the children in a nursery during the day. Her heart was weak and she should never have attempted anything so hard; but the laundry paid better than cleaning or sewing. Even so, she was barely able to make ends meet. There was no reserve for emergencies. When Frank, 6, had croup, she missed five days; when Louis, 4, had the measles, she lost almost three weeks. So it went. There were also Walter, 3, and Anne, 1. Mrs. D. fell far behind in her program of work. The family was starving when a neighbor telephoned to the charity organization about them. Mrs. D.'s first fear was lest the organization take her children away. When the doctor found that her determination to keep them had already overtaxed her strength, and ordered her do no more heavy work, she was frantic. "There must be something I can do," she said, "I will not give up my children." With assistance, she can keep them.

Their Father Is Dying.

Stanley W. was determined to give his three bright little girls an American education because neither he nor Mrs. W. had learned to read or write in the old country. He was one of the best workers in the factory; but he was impatient, after an attack of influenza, to get back to work. He thought he might lose his job. He said a man who has family responsibilities cannot take time to nurse a cold. While he was at work his strength began to fail. There was a second attack of influenza. Then came the doctor's verdict of tuberculosis. He was sent to a hospital, where he should have gone earlier. Mrs. W. found a janitor's position; and, with a few extra days' work and a little help from Mr. W.'s employer and from friends and neighbors, the family kept going. In the hospital Mr. W. did not improve. Now he can scarcely speak. Before he dies there is one thing he wants to know. How are his three little girls to be kept with their mother? Mrs. W., afraid to contract bills, has, when her own work has fallen off, fed the children bread and milk for days at a time. Margaret, who is 10, sees that her little sisters, Casimira, 9, and Irene, 7, attend the clinic regularly, and that they follow the doctor's orders about sleeping with the windows open and going to bed early. But she cannot follow his orders that they eat plenty of nourishing food. She must have help to do that.

"Help Wanted."

If Mrs. F. had not injured her hand, no one would have known how badly she needed help. She refused to enter an institution fifteen years ago when her husband deserted her at the age of 50. Until then she had never had to earn her living, but she said she "knew how to keep a nice home." Since then she has helped to keep many nice homes—working as a mother's helper, housekeeper and family seamstress. Sometimes, when her strength gave out, she had to take a little rest. As soon as she could, she pored again through the "Help Wanted" advertisements. She walked miles to answer them sometimes. Often she was told, "Oh, no, you're too old"; but she walked on until she found another job. She plans to find another "right away, as soon as I can move my hand just a bit"; but the doctor knows it will be months before her hand will be well enough. She is 65 now, and undernourished. To help her to the next job, funds are required.

Grandmother Has Hopes for Tim.

Grandmother R. came from Tipperary fifty years ago, when she was rosy-cheeked and life looked bright. She married within the year and followed her husband, Tim, a sailor in the navy, from port to port as his stations changed. Twenty years later, when Tim died in a Southern port, she brought her three little girls back to New York, which she always called home. She was able to support them and she did, through almost fifteen years of hard work and anxiety. When her three girls were grown up, one of them took the veil; another went into household service, and a third eloped—once, twice and then again. After the third time she left in the grandmother's care a young Tim who resembled his grandfather. Ten years ago the grandmother married Patrick R., a sober, respectable man who was retired on a pension, and her life seemed to glide into smooth water. Last Winter death took away the husband and his pension. The support of the grandmother and young Tim was undertaken by the slow and faithful daughter in service, but her earnings were too meager. The grandmother, at 68, is helplessly crippled by rheumatism and a fall on an icy pavement, but her eyes shine as she looks at her 13-year-old grandson, Tim. She asked for aid for him, saying, "I have great hopes for Tim." She needs help in feeding and sheltering him.

Three Still Enjoy Their Childhood.

Washing and scrubbing did not discourage Mrs. K. five years ago when she was left alone to provide for four children. She kept them bright and normal, unaware of her sacrifice. They were too young to see that she was looking more and more haggard. The oldest, Harry, who is 14, has finally grown to know. Now he works after school, running errands for the neighborhood stores and bringing home his small earnings intact. He has grown pale and depressed; but, by an unspoken understanding with his mother, he does not discuss the distress of the family with his younger brother, Seymour, who is 13, or with Bernard, 11, or Fanny 7. These three are still enjoying their childhood. As they grow, however, their needs increase, and, unless help is forthcoming they, too, will know despair.

Her Brother Died in Her Arms.

Mary is 5, a pretty girl with blue eyes that look bewildered when she talks of her "baby brother," who was the only person who ever loved her. One day when her mother was out with the two men roomers (the neighbors explain that the roomers and the mother went on bootlegging expeditions together), the baby, who was hungry, found a bottle the mother had left on the floor. He drank what was in it. In a moment he toppled over. Mary remembers it all vividly. She held him in her arms. She did not know what else to do for him. First he moaned a little, and then he was quiet. She thought he was asleep. After a while she noticed he was growing cold, and she held him closer. Then she cried, because she could not get him warm. A neighbor heard her and came it at last. She was still clinging to her baby brother, who had been dead for more than two hours. Her mother has since abandoned her, but Mary never mentions that. She talks of her baby brother often, and hopes there will be enough for him to eat when he comes back. There seldom was before. Mary needs nourishing food, shelter and warm clothing until a home can be found for her where she may, in time, forget. She is a responsive, affectionate little girl.

Margarita, 9, and Her Grandmother.

Margarita's grandmother, Oliva, seldom ventures out. She still feels unable to confront this strange new country, in which her son disgraced her, soon after her arrival, by deserting his family. She has always believed that his act was responsible for the death of his young American wife and two of their three children soon afterward. Since then Grandmother Oliva has supported the surviving child, Margarita, who immediately became her only link with the outside world. Inside a small flat in a rear tenement, the 9-year-old grandchild now steps back daily into the old fashioned world in which Grandomther Oliva is still living at 69. She tells her grandmother all the happenings of a modern American child's day and all about the fine school. She chatters for hours while the grandmother does sewing for which she is paid. This happy arrangement is now threatened by Grandmother Oliva's rheumatism. She can no longer sew enough to provide for Margarita's support, and money is needed to keep these two together.

A Good Provider Now Needs Help.

His wife, Mary J., explained proudly that John was always a good provider. When his joints stiffened with arthritis and he was carried away to the hospital, he told her to do the best she could for the four children until he got on his feet again. They were Louise, 7, Alice, 5, and Ralph, 4 years old, and Frank, 15 months old. The wife, a pale, delicate young woman, with dark, piercing eyes and black hair, joined the workers who keep the business offices of the city clean. She toiled late at night, when children are asleep and do not need their mothers. She spent John's savings thriftily. She pawned the mantel clock, the bedroom rug and the Morris chair that was John's pride. He did not want her to let people know they weren't making out. Then she found out that she was to have another child. The four children she has already have not enough food or clothing. She has nothing more to pawn. And shortly she must give up scrubbing floors. The family must have food, rent money and clothing.

Father and Son Both Invalids.

Mr. B. was an expert cutter of ladies' dresses. At 35, for no reason that he knew, his hand began to lose its steadiness. For four years he worried lest he lose his job. The scissors would slip and ruin garments; but the kindness of his employer spared him. An attack of paralysis finally laid him off. Now he sits at home staring into space. He rouses himself occasionally, as though from sleep, to complain of pain in his legs. The doctor says his spine and brain have been affected. His life is over at 39. Mrs. B., his wife, who is 35, now lives for their only son, Harry, who is 8. In a short time, Harry has had influenza and chicken-pox. He is underweight and pale and requires extra nourishment and convalescent care. Until Harry is improved in health, his mother cannot go out to find work to do at home, where father and son now sit bundled up in chairs opposite each other. "Pa is awful sick," Harry says. A Family Deserted by the Father.

She worked in a factory, a marriageable young woman, prudently putting aside a part of her salary so that her future husband might be able to set himself up in a small business. The husband who finally presented himself was Joseph M., an employe in the same factory. As soon as they were married she turned over her dowry to him; the small business was established, and they began to live comfortably. A daughter, a son and another daughter were born, but the husband seemed more interested in his own comfort than in making the little business grow with the needs of his growing family. He had already enjoyed six years of ease after the factory. Mrs. M. struggled with him two more years, trying to make him see his duty to her and the children. Then he left her a note one day, saying that he had sold his business and gone away to start life again for himself. Mrs. M. started to work again, in the hours left over from caring for the three young children. She could not look for help from her relatives. They had always been poor, and she did not want them to know what had happened. For a while she managed to earn enough to keep up with the rent, but not with the food. A school teacher noticed the change in Mrs. M.'s oldest child, Dorothy, 7, who, eager, carefree and always neatly dressed, had led the class the preceding year. This Fall Dorothy avoided other children and seemed dull and inattentive. When she came to school one day, looking very shamefaced in a boy's knickerbockers many sizes too large for her, she was questioned by the teacher, who found out that Mrs. M. was then reduced to clothing the children with odds and ends supplied by the neighbors. When the charity doctor was sent to look at the children, he said they needed months of special feeding after their months of starvation. Mrs. M. herself was suffering from undernourishment, but with help it is believed that she can carry on.

Trade Failed a Faithful Worker.

Mr. G. worked seventeen years for the same company, repairing musical instruments. In recent years the company has sold fewer instruments because radios now cost less than pianos; and because graphophones have replaced the banjos with which an earlier generation made music by hand. Fewer musical instruments in use meant fewer repairs, and steadily Mr. G.'s wages dwindled. He was living from day to day by the time he was finally laid off. He had a nice home and three attractive daughters, Jeanne, 12, Dolly, 10, and Ruth, 2, but the trade on which he had built his life no longer provided a job. He knew no other trade. He could not wait until he learned one. He had to work immediately, as a janitor; and his wife, who used to lavish devotion on her own home and children, went out to scrub. Now they have not enough to eat. For Mr. G. and his wife a nervous breakdown is impending. If the strain is lifted temporarily from this troubled household, Mr. G., at the age of 46, will be able to start again.

Old, Alone and in Need of Food.

Miss B. was a fashionable elocution teacher with a studio of her own in the 1890s. She went about in a sealskin coat and bright flowered hat, teaching children "voice modulation with appropriate gestures." As she grew to be middle-aged her clear voice began to falter and eventually, almost blind, she had to give up her work. She moved into a back room of a boarding house and washed dishes and answered the doorbell to help pay her rent. Her clothes grew threadbare. Her savings dwindled. Finally, she sold the sealskin, so long out of fashion, but still "such a comfort and so warm." She was 68 and she explained, "pretty things look silly on an old woman like me." She ate for a week longer on the $3 she got for the coat. She needs money for a warm room and more food.

At 37, He Is Crippled for Life.

Mr. G., at 36, was healthy and capable, and a devoted father. His oldest child, Harold, was an active youngster of 8; Lois was 6, and both were bright in school and a delight to their parents. June, the youngest, was 4, and already showing promise. A year later Mr. G. now sits quietly beside a window and watches life go past him. An attack of sleeping sickness brought on paralysis and he will never work again, never walk again. His wife is too frail and too much worn by the strain of his long illness to be able to do more, at present, than care for him and the three children. The doctor, who knows her condition, wonders by what strength of spirit she manages to do that. The children were always devoted to their parents, and, during the father's illness, the bond of family affection has grown even stronger. Mr. G. must go to an institution. Without help, his family will be separated.

She Wants a Mother Most of All.

"I had a mother once," Ellen says proudly. Her father beat her mother on the rare occasions when he came home; but he was regretted when he died, because his small, irregular contributions to the support of the family were needed. Ellen's mother, a thin, stooped woman who had once been pretty, attempted to solve her problem by remarriage. Eventually she found herself with a second set of children and a husband who refused any longer to "feed another man's kids." Ellen, with her brother and sister, was turned over to the charity association. Homes were quickly found for the brother and sister, but not for Ellen, who had been allowed to suffer from an ear infection for more than a year, and was pale and anemic. If money can be obtained for her food and shelter until she is physically restored, a home can be found for her. At the age of 7 Ellen says she does not mind being ill, but feels ashamed that she has no mother.

Rosa, Who Sews in the Kitchen.

Rosa sews linings in coats at 4 cents each. She is 24, small and frail, and the pile of coats almost hides her. She sews in the kitchen because the stove is there. She can do nothing else, because her youngest, Charles, was born only four months ago, and she also has Arnold, 2, and Peter, 4. Her husband is in the hospital with a rheumatic heart, and that will prevent him from returning to the trade of a stone mason. He must learn another trade when he comes out. Victim of a Hit-and-Run Driver.

Louie L. managed to support his wife and seven children until some hit-and-run driver, whom the police have never found, ran him down last Spring. Now he is an invalid. His wife, Mary, immediately went out to do housework and washing by the day, taking her three-months-old baby in her arms. When she returned from the day's work she sat up sewing on coats part of the night. Angela, the oldest child, who is 14, meanwhile managed the rest of the family: Lucy 12, Tony 10, Louise 7, Katie 6 and Mary 4. The children have grown thin and pale. Angela is broken by the strain of housekeeping. Now the mother has collapsed, and this family of nine is completely helpless.

"Please Don't Send Us Away."

When Mrs. W.'s husband beat her for the last time and left her, at the age of 41, with three children, she said wearily: "I'm glad he's gone." She went out and found housework in order to provide for her children. "I couldn't bear it," she said, "if they were not with me." For three years she managed. Now she has developed diabetes. Her oldest child, Mildred, is 15 and finishing a business course. "I want to hurry and earn money," she says. The second oldest, Julia, who is 11, clings to her mother and says, "Please don't send us away." They will be able to stay together soon by their own efforts, if they are helped temporarily.

The Father of Six Is Insane.

George was a well paid chef who was able to do much for his family. His wife, Laura, happily bore him six children before her kind husband began to have strange moods of unreasonableness. He suspected people—even Laura, eventually—of plotting against him. Between these moods he dimly realized what was happening to him; and the terror of losing his mind drove him into deeper despair. Laura induced him to go home to his mother in the country, hoping the change might help him. Doctors recently pronounced him "mildly insane." Laura is struggling to provide food for the six children for whom their father only recently discussed music lessons. She sends them to a nursery during the day, while she goes out and earns $15 a week. At night she washes their clothes and prays for their father's recovery. She cannot go on alone.

At 80 She Can't Work Any More.

Once she was taken to a concert, and that was the nicest thing that happened to Mrs. S. in a quarter of a century. She still talks of it. Long ago, before the San Francisco fire, she was a rich woman, happily married. Her husband died; and, later, the fire swept away his property. Mrs. S. has supported herself since by making the laces which once were her diversion. She is almost 80 now, a fragile old woman. Her blue eyes, strained through twenty years of lace making, cannot see enough to make another yard. Her health is failing fast, but the doctor says that is mostly due to her financial worries—the rent among others. These worries must be lifted.

A Family Who Ask Encouragement.

The doctor says Mr. K. is making valiant efforts to shake off the drug habit after years of addiction to it, and is in need of sympathy and encouragement. Mrs. K., his wife, is attempting to carry out the prescription. There are four children to be fed, however: Charles, 10; Florence, 7; Blanche, 3, and Stanley, 15 months old. Mr. K. is unable to work because of his weakness. Mrs. K. is expecting another child. Now encouragement is asked for both Mr. and Mrs. K.—money for food and rent.

Not a Year Old and Motherless.

Ernestine laughs readily and takes her food well. She will be a year old on Jan. 13, and she has yet to learn that she has no mother, not even a bad one. Her mother was arrested time after time, until it was decided that she was not a proper person to take care of a child. If some one will provide for food and the care of a nurse, Ernestine may laugh on her first Christmas and find kind parents to adopt her.

Jimmie's Father Has Gone Blind.

Jimmie is proud of his father, who used to play in an orchestra. It filled engagements in every part of this country, and Jimmie's father has plenty of stories to tell his 10-year-old son on their walks together. Jimmie leads him, because the father has gone blind after a six-year struggle with cataracts. The treatments took the family savings. Because there were plenty of stories, Jimmie did not notice the lack of food so much as did Connie, 9; Celia, 8; George, 5, and Janet, 3. Recently, however, he had to lead his father to the charity bureau to ask for aid. The mother sews, but cannot earn enough to provide for the family of seven until their father learns some simple trade for the blind.

Deserted His Family of Five.

Mrs. L. always worked hard for her family. After her marriage she helped her husband run a farm. Things seemed to go well at times, but the spells of temper which her husband began to develop grew more frequent and more violent. She made excuses for him to the neighbors and to her children: Francesco was tired; he had been disappointed; she had not been patient; she would try to make things easier. She went to court only when he beat her. Standing before the magistrate she said: "I don't think it's right that a wife should be beaten by the husband she loves, and I don't think the children should see it." After that her husband deserted her. She now lives in a dilapidated tenement with Jennie, who is 7; Frank, 4; Joseph, 3, and Amelia, 2. She believes she can give them what no one else can, and she is attempting to support them by finishing dresses. But she cannot do everything alone.

CASE 37.

Her Age Works Against Her.

Minnie L. is not much more than 50. For ten years the $15 a week that she earned in good weeks behind a department store counter supported her and her 82-year-old mother. Because she was so often hungry that it made her feel sick, she could not move around and wait on people fast and she looked older than her age. So, when business gets slack, she is the first to be laid off. When she walks into a new store she is clean and neat, but not smart, because she has not had a new black dress in five years. The employment manager shakes his head. "Your age is against you, lady." She has grown so frightened of that, as she waits for it, that she cannot answer quickly when the employment manager asks questions. So he sends her away for being stupid. Mothers who let her care for their children do not ask her to come again, because she always looks worried and that is bad for the children.

The Mother of Two Has Collapsed.

She taught her two children manners and tried to feed them after her artist husband deserted a year ago, taking all of their savings. Mary Anne was 12 and Dorothy 10. The mother, Margaret L., could only sew. She sewed day and night, but could not provide enough food for three. So she fed most of it to Mary Anne and Dorothy until she collapsed. Lest her children be taken away from her, she appealed to the charity organization for help until she should recover her health. It was difficult to believe, by that time, that she was only 33 and had ever been beautiful. The children, undernourished in spite of her sacrifices, were also in need of medical attention. Money will start this family on the road to health and self-support.

He Worked While He Was Able.

The doctor told Mr. E. that he had high blood pressure and should give up his work as a cloakmaker. Mr. E. had a wife and five children. He worked until a stroke stopped him. When he recovered he peddled handkerchiefs. Again he was stopped by collapse. He plans to engage in another occupation when he is well enough. Now Mrs. E. can earn little while she is caring for her sick husband and the five children. The rent is overdue. Food is growing scarcer. Prolonged undernourishment has sent the oldest child, Rose, who is 15, to a sanitarium just as she was growing old enough to work. The younger children are also undernourished. Mrs. E. has asked for assistance in keeping the family together through the critical period.

A Young Family Faces a Crisis.

Sara G. graduated from the Vienna Conservatory of Music and at 23 looked forward to a career as a concert pianist. Then she fell in love and married a cornetist. Four years have gone by and her husband has proved to be a deserter. She has one 3-year-old son and a daughter just walking and now she is expecting another child. A neighbor watches over the two children in the evening and she has found work playing the piano in a moving picture house. But she will soon have to go to the hospital. Help must come for her.

Benny Lived in a Henhouse.

A shack that once served as a henhouse was the last home that Benny had with his mother. She took shelter there after his father deserted them. At every lap in the shingles rain came through the roof. When Benny was 6 his mother gave up her struggle to keep him and turned him over to the association. His new caretakers found he had not been spoiled by his difficult life. When they bathed him they pronounced him a handsome child, though he was underweight. He was affectionate, learned quickly and played eagerly. Now funds are asked to prepare him for the new home he may find.

She Would Not Fail Her Brother.

Since Anna died at the age of 80, it has become more difficult for Loretta, who is 75, to provide for their brother, Thomas. Thomas is 70 and has been an invalid from heart disease for eighteen years. In their day the two women were expert needlewomen in a fashionable dressmaking establishment and maintained a home for Thomas in which nothing has changed since the '90s—nothing, from the large gilt-framed photographs of their forebears crowding the walls to the oil lamp in the centre of the table. Anna and Loretta managed with their savings and their work. But, alone, Loretta now finds it impossible to carry on. She says, "I wouldn't mind so much being put away in a public institution if it weren't for Thomas. He might feel that I had failed him after all these years." If she is aided financially, these old people may go on together in their own home until the end.

The Future Looks Dark for Five.

R. came to America at the age of 36 and worked so industriously at his trade of stonecutter that after three years he was able to send for his wife and four children. When they arrived, he brought them to a well-furnished home. New York was a wonderful place to them. The children, Peter, 14; John, 13; Theresa, 11, and Jane, 9, rapidly adjusted themselves in an American school. The father worked hard and never took a day off until he felt ill one day. He made light of his illness, saying he was "as hard as the stone he cut." The illness persisted. Finally he called at the hospital and was kept there. A few months later he died of cancer. His widow and four children are now destitute, and unless they receive help the future is dark for them.

If They Are to Live Longer.

Mr. L. can still get himself out on the fire escape "to catch air and sun," as he remembers the doctor's prescription. For his creeping paralysis the doctor offers no hope of recovery. Inside the flat, Mrs. L. has no hope of recovery for herself, either. She has severe heart trouble. All she can do is to keep the window curtains washed, darned and starched and the home bright and clean. He is 50. She is 49. A comfortable old age seemed assured to them once when he was a successful storekeeper. When Mr. L. comes in from the fire escape, they talk of their two girls and a boy who died in infancy. There is nothing ahead and their illnesses have gradually brought them to the end of their savings. They must have help without delay.

He Works Though He Is Ill.

Robert left school and his hope of a profession when his father died. At 18 he began to support his mother and his four younger brothers and sisters. He earned only $18 a week as a clerk, and the family for the first time experienced poverty. But at least they were together. After two years of undernourishment and strain, Robert became ill. The doctors found tuberculosis had set in. Robert consented to have his name placed on the waiting list of a sanitarium. But he returned to work, and every time there was a vacancy at the sanitarium he said he would work a little longer, because he was not certain that his mother and the younger children would be taken care of. In despair Robert's mother finally appealed for help. She wants him to have a rest while there is still a chance for him.

Old Age of a Ballet Dancer.

She could remember audiences asking her for encores, and she found it hard to ask for food. But "you can't be a ballet dancer at 66," she explained. She spent her savings in bringing up Milton, her grandson, so frugally that they have both been half-starved for the past six years. Now Milton, who is not a strong boy because he has not had enough to eat, has his first job, as a clerk "with a promise of a future" and a meager salary, on which both were attempting to live. The grandmother explains that she suddenly realized she had no right to starve her grandson further for the sake of her pride. Both are in want of food.

Only the Helpless Remain.

All of Mrs. S.'s children have married and left her except Alex, 19, who is childish and requires her constant care. Her husband struggled to the age of 66 with a bad heart; and now a cancer, which keeps him in constant pain, has made him helpless in her care. Mrs. S. is as old as her husband and looks as tired, but she refuses to part with him or with her son. To provide for them she denies herself rest and care. Her married children are struggling for themselves and unable to help her. Funds are asked in order that her burden may be lighter.

A Pioneer Drops by the Wayside.

Antonio and Carmella, newly married, came to America seven years ago to establish their home because conditions would be better for them here. Antonio was lean and strong, and he found work in a building trade. Carmella, his wife, and little Carmella, now 5; Angelina, 3, and Serena, 1, were happy until Antonio fell ill with kidney trouble. The doctors say he will probably never work again. He sits at home now. Carmella makes buttonholes in men's suits and earns a little, but not enough. These pioneers need assistance in bringing up their three healthy American children.

They Were in Sight of Happiness.

When Isabel was 6 and Harleigh was 3 their mother fainted at the head of a stairway, fell and was killed. She had had a hard life. Her husband, who drank and gambled, also had beaten her and starved his family. The two children, after her death, were exposed to his cruelty. But their salvation seemed assured when a woman who could not bear to separate them took both children into her home and carefully led them into the normal happy life of childhood. Ten years have passed. Now the woman who rescued them has lost most of her money and finds it impossible to provide food and clothing for them any longer. The charity association which has watched her wisely shaping their lives feels that she is the right mother for them. Money is wanted to pay her the children's board, so that she may continue to guide them through their adolescent years.

Her Fingers Gnarled With Work.

Martha is a colored laundress who made a home for her three grandchildren when her only daughter died three years ago and her daughter's husband deserted them. She is a fine, intelligent worker, as clean as the piles of clothes she turns out so dependably; but the amount of ironing it is necessary for her to do day after day if she is to feed and shelter herself and the three children is beyond the strength of any woman of 62. The children, Susan, 11, Mary, 8, and Joseo, 5, are healthy and well mannered, and have good school records, but their needs grow with them. The grandmother's fingers are gnarled and swollen. Help is wanted to keep this household going.

CASE 51.

At the End of His Effort.

When the doctors told Mr. B. that his heart was bad and would last a long or a short time depending on how he managed it, he had four small sons and a wife to support. So he managed his heart carefully according to the doctor's directions, and his wife managed his earnings so skillfully, that the family got along for eight years. Now Mr. B. is at the end of his effort and the work which Mrs. B. can do outside will not support them. Carl, the oldest son, who is 10, has long been aware, it seems, of the shadow over their home; for he presents to his father every few days a new plan for making money. Unless help is forthcoming, six will all be hungry by Christmas.

CASE 52.

Victim of Tuberculosis.

Mr. J. refused ever to let any doctors examine him and he would not allow any of his children to be examined. When he was finally removed to the hospital in the last stages of tuberculosis, his wife and children still feared him so that they dared not accept medical aid until they knew he was dead. His daughter Jean, 22, who had provided most of the family income by working day and night as a sewing machine operator, earning at piece rates, was found to be in an advanced state of tuberculosis. Rose, 21, also was tubercular, but not hopelessly. Philip, 20, who was working his way through college and making an exceptional record, developed the same malady. The two remaining children, who are twins, Edwin and Elsie, 17, and Mrs. J. herself are underweight, but the doctors say they need only sufficient care, food and shelter and they will escape.

Her Friends and Health Are Gone.

The landlady does not want to turn Mrs. Clara T. out, because she does not know what will happen to her. When Mrs. T.'s husband died fifteen years ago, Mrs. T. had no trouble in supporting herself. She was a college graduate and she found one position after another in families in which she acted as governess and housekeeper. Her written references are excellent. She saved money and put it in the bank. Three years ago she broke down and her savings gradually went to pay her inexpensive board. She is now 62, small, frail-looking, gentle in manner; and she says she has outlived the friends who might have helped her in time of need. Her only friend now is the landlady, who is so poor herself that she can keep Mrs. T. no longer. For Mrs. T., food and shelter must be found.

He Failed When He Was 70.

Mr. D. was a man of means until he was 70. Then his business failed. He walked the streets willing to take any kind of work, as he did when he started out in life. Day after day, as he walked, he ate less; his hands trembled more, and prospective employers more promptly decided he was too old. At last he came to talk it over with the charity organization. Its investigators say he is the kind of man who would die swiftly and unhappily in an institution. He has maintained his independence for more than half a century. Prompt aid will provide a room and food for him.

A Mother Making a Last Stand.

G. was a skilled mechanic, but he preferred a white-collar job. He failed to get and keep one and finally left his family. For five years Mrs. G. has been cleaning offices from 3:30 A. M. until 8 and then rushing home to give her six children breakfast and send them to school. She has had another cleaning job in the afternoon, from which she returned at night to prepare supper and put the children to bed. The oldest, Dorothy, 15, is suffering from heart trouble and she also has to wear a brace, but says she will soon be able to help her mother. The rent is overdue again, but the furniture, which was moved into a poorer home at each successive crisis in her father's jobs, is too old and broken to be moved further. It is the last stand, Mrs. G. says. Poor as their home is, they could still be happy in it; and she asks for help in keeping it.

Grace, 16, an Orphan.

When Grace was 5, her mother and father died of influenza within a day of each other. She remembers her first night as an orphan. She lay on a pile of old clothing in a neighbor's flat, terrified by the family dog, who slept in the same room. "I wasn't used to dogs then; I wouldn't be afraid now," she says. She continued to stay with this neighbor, who had younger children and decided that Grace could take care of them. From the age of 5 Grace worked early and late, before and after school hours, caring for the children. She was made to do more and more of the housework, such as sewing and cooking, as she grew up and could be taught. During eleven years of obedience and hard work, she was never allowed time for girl friends, and only heard of parties. Now the woman who brought her up has notified the charity association that she wishes to turn over an orphan. Grace, at 16, is frail and unhappy. She needs clothing, food and shelter.

Jacob, 13, Feels the Weight of Care.

The charity investigator found her sobbing. Word had just come from the hospital that her husband was on the "danger list." For days all she and her four children had had to eat was cold potatoes. While the mother sobbed, the children watched her in bewilderment. The oldest, Jacob, 13, seemed to feel the responsibility of the family. His forehead was puckered and he looked like a little old man. He remembers the time when his father, a successful tailor, was able to send him to Summer camp; but now his father is ill and there is no money even for food. This family must have immediate help.

The Father Deserted This Family.

Rosalind B.'s husband never took his responsibilities seriously. He left her, when she was 22, with a son just learning to walk and a second child about to be born. She continued to do heavy work in a restaurant until a month before the birth of her daughter. Since then five overworked years have put her in need of a respite from anxiety and privation so that she may go on again. She is carefully bringing up the two children, Andrew, 7, and Lucy, 5, teaching them table manners and a prayer before sleep which includes their absent father.

Five Years of Unaided Struggle.

As long ago as 1924, when Mr. D. was taken to the hospital with diabetes, the visiting nurse thought his family needed aid. But Mrs. D. and her eldest child, Hilda, who was then 10, said, "Father wouldn't want us to take strangers' money, thank you, and when he gets better it'll be all right." Mrs. D. cleaned offices. Hilda looked after the four younger children. Mr. D. improved; he was not well enough to get back his job as a bricklayer, but he was able to do lighter work. The story repeated itself and the father became ill again and again Mrs. D. took up her work of cleaning offices, while Hilda brought up the family. Now the children are at ages at which they require more to sustain them. Fred is 13; Dick, 11; Gus, 9, and Jim, 6. Mr. D. is unlikely ever to return from his latest visit to the hospital; and Hilda, who flung her health as well as her devotion into the struggle to "bring up the babies nice," is trying to complete a business course and is physically unequal to it. At the age of 15, she needs a rest. Mrs. D., who works from 8 in the morning until 10 at night, needs to have some hours free for the children she loves. The children require clothes and more food.

Aline, Who Is 7, Has Been Beaten.

Every time Aline's mother looked at her she saw the likeness to the husband who made life miserable until he ran away from a court order requiring him to provide for Aline's support. After the father's desertion the mother, who could no longer bear to keep Aline, turned her over to the grandfather, who had posted the bond required by the court to insure the execution of the support order. Thereafter, Aline's grandfather, noticing her resemblance to the undutiful son who had forfeited his bond, beat her frequently. The charity association took Aline away at the age of 7. She is in need of proper food and tender care before a home is found for her.

Ten Children in Want.

Edmund G. enjoyed his ten children so much that he never thought of them as a problem. The children enjoyed life, too. Their father had a flourishing butcher shop on a corner. Three years ago heart and kidney disease began to trouble him. He lost his shop and now he cannot even work as a butcher. The health of ten children has suffered with his fortunes. They no longer have the strength for average school work and they catch every infection that passes their way. The mother can do no more than care for her large family. Immediate financial support may prevent Mr. G.'s misfortune from wrecking their lives.

Two Old Women Lost Their All.

After a lifetime of domestic service, Bridget, 80, and Maggie, 60, invested their hard-earned savings in a small candy store near a school. All went well until a competitor opened across the street with more varieties than Bridget and Maggie could afford to stock, at prices they could not meet. Their business dwindled. One day they paid all their bills; paid the landlord, and closed the doors. They said: "We couldn't let anybody be owing." They had nothing left but a collection of excellent references and were too old to return to domestic service. While arrangements are being made to keep them together, they need food and shelter.

A Delivery Boy of 17 Supports Five.

Dan, 17, earns $14 a week as a delivery boy. He dislikes the work but he dares not risk changing it. If his earnings stopped, the family would have nothing. There are three younger children and his mother, who has a weak heart but who is able to keep house and mend old clothes so that the children need not be ashamed of their appearance. Their father, who died a year ago, was a painter, who provided well for them and was delighted that they had his musical aptitude. He taught them all to play. Dan, the delivery boy, gave promise of developing into a fine pianist, but now he can work only at what will bring in money immediately. His $14 a week is not enough to provide food and shelter for the family.

She Believes He Can Start Again.

William M. was a skilled tailor, with a prospering business of his own and money in the bank, until illness made it more and more difficult for him to keep up with his work. His customers fell away. The comforts of his home gradually vanished. His children, Mary, 9; Dick, 7; Clarence, 4, and Victor, 2, did not have enough to eat. Their condition was noticed at school and the visiting nurse, who came to investigate, discovered their distress. The sick father, by that time out of work and out of funds, was humiliated. His wife had never lost confidence in him. "It is only because he has been sick," she explained. "He can get started again if we can only get some one to give us a hand." Assistance temporarily given has already improved the health and spirit of the whole family. Mrs. M. is contributing to the new start by doing janitress work for their rent. Her husband is already talking of building up a business again and has begun to do a little work at home. If he can have help until his recovery is complete, Mr. M., with his wife and four small children, will be restored to happiness.

Grace, at 17, Supports Ten.

Her father is slowly recovering from nephritis. Grace, who is 17, can earn so little as a clerk that the family, when the charity investigator called, was having nothing but coffee without milk for lunch. The father, who will not be strong enough to work for months; the mother, who looks twenty years older than the 40 she is, and the seven younger children (Roger, 15; Jim, 14; Edith, 13; Anna, 12; Laura, 11; Mildred, 9, and Peter, 8) were all sitting in ragged coats close about a small fire of wood they had salvaged from the street, waiting for Grace to come home. Grace did not complain. She said her younger brothers were "swell kids and pick up a bit selling papers or something, but they've got to stay in school a little while, else they'll never earn good money." The family needs temporary assistance. The children are all normal, bright and willing, but they are thin and hungry.

Lucille and Donald Have Nothing.

Lucille, 6, and Donald, 4, waited alone at night. Their mother had gone away again, but she did that so often that they regarded it as a matter of course. They were waiting for their father, who, when he was sober, cared for them more than their mother did. But the father did not come. He had been taken to the hospital with delirium tremens. When the charity worker came for them, Lucille was comforting her little brother with a motherliness she had never herself experienced. Their mother has not returned. Without even the father who, in his irresponsible fashion, provided something for them in the past, they now face Christmas in need of everything.

Work Strained This Father's Heart.

Peter was proud of his strength. Construction foremen used to take one look at his mighty shoulders and hire him. At 34, his heart is ruined by muscular overstrain and he cannot attempt the slightest task. His wife, looking worn and ill, sews and patches and scrubs all day. She was never very robust, but her husband, Peter, used to say he had enough strength for all. They have five children who need food; and the rent is overdue.

CASE 68.

The Task Was Too Great for Her.

Angelina B. found herself penniless with four small children and a sick husband, Tony, 39, who was suffering from chronic rheumatism and a heart condition. She compressed expenses and moved the family into two small rooms; then she considered ways in which she might make money and at the same time care for her family. She found work embroidering and doing fine bead designs on bags at home. She had to do a great number of bags in order to provide shelter and food for four children and a husband; but she was determined not to be separated from them. It was late at night before her package of home work was tied up, to be delivered at the factory next day. She had little time to sleep. Weariness accumulated and she worked more slowly, but she knew how much she must earn to meet expenses. It was later and later each night before her beadwork was finished. Then she had still to do her housework and her sewing and making over of clothes for the children before she slept. Her health finally gave way. Despite her economy and her hard work, the separation which she tried to avert by her own efforts can now be prevented only by help from others.

CASE 69.

"Crippled Harry," the Newsboy.

Harry F. was a skilled shirt operator, well able to provide for his family. Then he fell on his hip and was crippled for life. His wife, who had just borne the twelfth child, could not recover her strength. His oldest son, Joe, 18, worked almost a year to support the family. He ran away. Morris, 17, who thus became the main support, had a sudden attack of appendicitis and died on the operating table. Annie, 16, now earns $12 a week as a stenographer and contributes all of it to the family. Sam, 15, undernourished, is finishing a commercial course and is about to start work. The six younger children, Jeanette and Ethel, twins, 12; Jack, 8; Mary, 6; David, 3, and the baby, Tessie, stayed on the top floor of a tenement. They were ragged and so starved that they no longer had energy to play among themselves. On the street corner, when it did not rain, "Crippled Harry the Newsboy," at the age of 47, attempted to sell papers. At best he could not compete effectively with the youngsters who darted through the crowd. His fortunes steadily sank. He went without food until he could no longer call out his papers vigorously enough to be noticed. When he was so weak that he could not climb back up the stairs to his top-floor flat, he went to the philanthropic association for help.

A Father Who Despaired.

The shop went out of business suddenly, and Walter L. began to hunt another job. At the age of 42, a steady worker, he had put aside something to care for Winifred, his wife, and their two girls, Charlotte, 5, and Dolly, 3; but he found it was not enough. He was still hunting a job when he had to send his wife with the two children to stay with a friend for the night, because there was no more money for coal. Next morning his wife was notified that her husband had tried to kill himself and was in a hospital. The doctor said he would recover, but could not work for a long time. His wife, who is 29, found work to support herself and two children. But she has asked the charity organization for an allowance to supplement her $9 weekly wages "for a little while, so that my husband may come home." Until he recovers, his family must have help.

crippled and speechless for life. Still Mrs. G. did the best she could, through fifteen years, and the boy, Roy, worked hard at school and never caused her a bit of trouble. He was healthy and ambitious. He wanted to be an aviation mechanic, and at high school he shaped his course that way. Mrs. G.'s pension is cut in half now because of Annette's age; and she will lose her widow's pension for Roy in six months, when he becomes 16. Mrs. G. cannot earn enough, and Roy, who says he will soon be able to take care of them all, is not yet able to do it. The home is thus faced with a crisis, but temporary assistance will meet it.

Beatrice—An Unwanted Baby.

Beatrice's father was a high school student when he married, and her mother was as young. Their marriage lasted only seven months after Beatrice was born. When it broke up, they brought Beatrice to the charity association. Neither had wanted a baby and neither would assume any further responsibility for it. Beatrice has shiny down on her head, and bright eyes. Unwanted, she wants little; but even an unwanted baby must eat.

A Crippled Taxi Driver.

By thrift and careful planning Jim C. got a taxicab. He drove it proudly through the streets. He was, as he said, "on his own at last." Shortly afterward he was hit by another car while he was repairing his machine at the curb. His hip was broken and he lay for months in the hospital. At home, his wife cut down the food for their six young children. She is expecting another within a month and cannot go out to work. They were all dangerously undernourished when Jim came back. The doctors tell him he cannot work for months. His damage suit for injuries is on a crowded court calendar and will not be heard for some time. Immediate help will save this family.

Can Four Live on $5 a Week?

Mr. S. was in the hospital with sleeping sickness. Mrs. S. was taking in boarders and doing their mending and laundry in addition. The oldest child, Dan, 14, did errands to earn what he could. Rebecca, 9, cried for more when Mrs. S. gave her the daily dry bread and tea. Sam, 4, whimpered unhappily most of the day. Mrs. S. went to see her husband. He stared at her with vacant eyes and mumbled sentences in a toneless voice. They meant nothing. After striving to find means whereby four could live on $5 a week, Mrs. S. was forced to ask for help.

Despair Has Visited This Family.

Illness of father and mother consumed the resources of the A. family. The father, 43, is back from the hospital, but his shop has failed. The mother, 32, is recovering from an operation for tubercular glands. The father is now doing the housework, because it is all he will have strength to do for months. The money these two parents put aside to give Leonard, 12, and Henry, 8, an education, has been spent to provide food for them. The father and mother are bordering on despair. The two youngsters, who are bright and affectionate, reflect the discouragement of their parents. They are shy about playing with other children. A little help will enable this family to recover its spirit.

His Heart Has Failed Him.

George W. tried to enlist in 1918, but the doctors said, "You can't go, with your heart." As a cutter in a high-grade tailoring shop, however, he was able to work. He married. He and his wife were happy and they got on. They had four children. Last year George was told that he had chronic heart disease and that he would be unable to work for the rest of his life. His wife now embroiders, twelve hours a day, and earns $5 a week. George helplessly watches her and the four children grow thinner. Betty is 8, Millie, 7; Jessie, 5, and Jack 2. The rent is unpaid, and Mrs. W. has told the diet kitchen nurse that she can no longer buy milk for the children. She must have help for her family.

Jerry Takes His Father's Place.

Jerry, who is 15, left school and found work as a delivery boy the day his father died. A week later, when he brought home his first $10 pay envelope, he seemed to feel himself a man carrying a full-sized responsibility. His mother did not let him know that $10 a week will not balance the budget for a widow and five children left without savings or insurance. Overwhelmed by Blindness.

Miss A. took in an invalid niece as an orphan of 12. She was a skilled milliner and for seven years had no difficulty in providing for them both. Her eyes first began to fail five years ago and she turned from sewing hats to selling them. She had handled so many that she was clever at finding the right hat for a customer, and soon she was recognized as the best saleswoman in the shop. But her eyes became steadily worse and one day she brought a red hat to a woman who had asked her repeatedly for a brown one. "You can't sell hats that you can't see," the shop manager said when he discharged her. After that she took in roomers until she was almost blind and could no longer care for the rooms. Her savings are gone. At 39 she asks for help until she can learn how to sew without using her eyes, so that she may continue to support herself and the invalid niece whom she took in twelve years ago.

She Wants to Keep Her Home.

Martha D., 21, had a 2-year-old child, Adele, and was expecting another. Her husband walked the streets, sleepless and penniless, looking for work. He made the acquaintance of a man who told him the "getaway" was sure and persuaded him to help. They were caught in a hold-up and the young husband was sentenced to prison for two years. His wife was dispossessed from their flat. She came to the charity organization and explained that her husband was not really bad. "It was only being out of work and seeing me and the baby wanting things," she said. "When he was a boy he hadn't any proper home life or training in a trade." She wants to keep her home together, so that Adele and the child about to be born may never do anything "so foolish." Her husband is penitent and asks her to give him another chance when he gets out. She says she is sure he will go straight the rest of his life if he can come back to a good home. She asks help with the rent and food during the coming year.

This Is Probably His Last Year.

Martin was a painter who earned good wages, had savings in the bank, and made plans with his wife, Ellen, for the future of their three children. When he began to have pains in his stomach, the clinic advised an X-ray; but he was unwilling to draw on the precious savings. He had always been so strong that he was sure the pains would go soon. In six months he had to have the X-ray, after all; and it showed cancer of the stomach, which (although he does not know it) is now too far advanced to be cured by an operation. Week after week, he says hopefully, "Next week I'll see about part-time work; then I can work up my strength to a regular job." At 70, His Eyes Are Failing.

Ten years ago, when M. was a widower of 60, esteemed in his trade, he married a young woman of 30. At 63, when a daughter was born, he was overjoyed, because his first marriage had been childless. Later came two other children. At 65, he went into business for himself, but his partner ran away with M.'s life savings, and at 66 he started again to work at his trade. But failing eyesight finally cost him his job. At 68 he began to do heavy labor and kept at it until his sight was so poor that he was twice hit by trucks. When he was 70 his wife, who was then 40, went out to work and left him at home to mind the three children and do the housework. Every day his eyes grow worse. Doctors can do nothing. $12 a Week Will Not Feed Five.

Two months ago neither Dorothy B. nor any one in her family had ever needed outside help. Then the mother, who worked as a janitress, died suddenly. Dorothy, who is the oldest daughter and has a child of her own—her husband has deserted her—began to keep house for the rest of them. Then the father was stricken with heart disease and the doctors told him he could no longer be a baker. Within a fortnight the oldest son, who had been a great help to him in the business, and the second oldest, who had just started to work as an electrician, were both sent to a tuberculosis sanitarium. The two sons in the sanitarium have a good chance of getting well. The father, if relieved from anxiety, can learn a lighter trade. Meanwhile, Dorothy, the only remaining wage earner, has put her whole soul into keeping his home together. She cooks, sews and scrubs for her father, her young brother and sister and her own child; and in addition she does sewing for which she is paid. The $12 a week she earns will not support five persons. With temporary help this family can be made completely self-sustaining, as it was before misfortune came.

He Asks to Remain at Home.

Edward B. left the hospital without leave and went home to his wife. He was 56, far advanced in tuberculosis and he knew it. He said he saw no reason for remaining separated from Rose, since very little of life was left to him. The doctors found the change did him good. At home he was able to move about and sit in the sun on the front doorsteps, whereas in the hospital he had been bedridden. Rose, from long practice, knows how to take care of him and the doctors agreed that it would be inadvisable to separate them. Funds are asked that the two may be kept together.

A Family Struggles Against Illness.

Mr. D. was taken to the hospital and Mrs. D. went out and got a job. She worked all day cleaning other people's houses and did her own housework at night. Without warning, Frances, 3, was taken to the hospital with scarlet fever. Three weeks later Baby Louise died of pneumonia. When Frances came back from the hospital, pale and quiet, she sat in a corner and smiled but did not answer when spoken to. She had completely lost her hearing. Mrs. D. collapsed and the doctor ordered her to stop work. Mary Ann, her oldest, aged 6, who was formerly a gay, light-hearted little girl, now wears the look of worry. He Knew He Had Tuberculosis.

Armand R. knew he had tuberculosis but he kept at his job so that his family might not suffer. The men who had worked twelve years beside him in the same shoe factory pitied him; and, when exhaustion forced him to go home early, they finished his work for him. But in spite of their help his wages began to decrease. He wanted to keep going until his oldest child, Katie, should be able to start earning. There were six children younger than Katie, and a delicate mother to be fed. Recently he was taken away to a tuberculosis hospital. Katie, at 15, will not be able to work until next year. She and the six other children are so undernourished that they are in danger, although they have as yet shown no signs of tuberculosis. She Is Old and Alone and Poor.

Janet R's. husband and her only child died long ago. Her flat in one of the city's oldest tenements is furnished with a table, two chairs, a cot—nothing else. There is neither electricity nor gas; but the rent is only $9 a month. She counted herself lucky, "compared to some poor things that can't work," for she had a steady job in a cigar factory at $10 a week. Last Spring the factory moved away from New York, and she found herself, at the age of 60, crippled with rheumatism and a weak heart, and out of a job. There does not seem to be another for her. CASE 97.

Deserted With Seven Children.

Mrs. E. was deserted a year ago. She was 33, with six children and another expected. She scrubbed floors as long as she could and then after the seventh child was born she recommenced. She went without food so that the children might have enough. But, despite her efforts, the pallor spread on 14-year-old Annie's cheeks, while the others—Tom, 12; Mabel, 10; Martha, 7; Betty, 4; Dan, 3, and even 8-months-old Joey—grew thinner and thinner. Hope deserted her. She was sure they would all die. Broken in spirit and health, she called for help through the Winter, hardly daring to hope, she said, "that any one would care enough to answer."

CASE 98.

"Furnished Rooms to Let."

In two small rooms which Mrs. Agnes M. has furnished for lodgers she has put her "good" furniture—all that is left from the days when she had a husband and five sons. They are all long since dead. She says her sons would never have let her come to want, and she hopes the lodgers will find the "good" furniture attractive. When both rooms are filled, however, it is as much as the little lame old woman can do to keep them neat, for she is 65 and slowly growing more helpless from arthritis. When the sign "Furnished Rooms to Let" hangs outside, she sits listening for footsteps that may mean new lodgers. Even with what the lodgers pay, she needs a little help.

Amount needed, $250.

Alone at 61, She Makes Flowers.

For twenty years her husband was part owner of a small business. Two years ago it failed. He and his wife, Serena, were destitute in their old age, after a lifetime of self-support in comfort. Within a year he died. Serena, who had no children, had centred her life about her husband and the home where she is now alone. Her only desire, at 61, is to remain in the rooms where they had known so many happy years together. She has never worked outside; and there is very little she can do now, because an accident many years ago left her right arm and hand hanging helpless by her side. She makes artificial flowers, slowly, with her good left hand, and asks, gently, for the first time in her life, for help.

Amount needed, $650.

Now She Is Too Old to Sew.

Miss W. was used to giving help, not to asking it. She had a well-paying dressmaking establishment not so long ago, as she measures time by the span of her eighty years. When she retired, a friend who was in need borrowed money, heavily. It was never repaid. Since then she has taken in sewing; but, as the years pass, fewer and fewer women are willing to entrust the making of their clothes to one so old. Miss W. dreads debt. She economized so long that malnutrition brought her to the hospital. There she asked that she might sew in return for the help that was given to her. She made clothes, beautifully finished, for the needy, but her old hands are too slow, no matter how willing her heart may be. She is now out of the hospital, but she is able to pay neither for food nor rent. She has not had a new pair of shoes in fourteen years.

Amount needed, $500.

"A SENSE OF HUMAN BROTHERHOOD"

What the One Hundred Neediest Appeal means to the cause of organized charity in New York is indicated by such letters as the following, received after the completion of the Neediest Appeal last year. George R. Canfield, President of the Board of Managers of the State Charities Aid Association, wrote in part:

"We are facing the new year armed against the forces which lead to misery and strengthened by the knowledge of the sympathy of men and women who responded to your call. The value of your appeal in relieving human distress and quickening the sense of human brotherhood, impresses every one.

"No one can read the stories of these cases you have printed without being more wise and more tender. It is interesting and informative for those out of touch with social work to know some of the things which happen to men and women and children right in the midst of this most prosperous city in the world.

"All these stories are real. They are as close to the truth as we ever get, I think."

A separate estimate of the Neediest Appeal was printed in the eighty-third annual report of the Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor, reading in part as follows:

"Very helpful in the process of causing the community as a whole to appreciate increasingly the type of charitable work undertaken by this association, and the need for it, has been the significant annual campaign of The New York Times, known wherever The Times is known as the One Hundred Neediest Cases.

"Thoughtfully and sympathetically conducted as this campaign is it makes possible a stimulation of thinking with regard to social welfare problems of the city that could not be secured by voluntary organizations, even with the expenditure of considerable sums of money, without the aid of an influential daily reaching to many homes."

On behalf of another of the great philanthropic bodies of the city, the following was written by Lawson Purdy, director of the Charity Organization Society:

"Year by year the appeal made by The Times arouses more and enduring emotions. When there is a terrible disaster, the horror of it, in and of itself, makes demands for help that cannot be withstood. In such a case there is neither room, nor need, for over-emphasis on suffering. The mind shrinks from horror. When there is, week after week, some new disaster, as in time of war, we become accustomed to it, our nerves are dulled and we no longer respond.

"There is a continuing need in the community that calls for help, and our approach to it should be such that we do not over-emphasize the suffering and sorrow, but rather put the emphasis where The Times puts it—upon the continuing character of the relief afforded and the possibility of recovery.

"All contributors to the One Hundred Neediest Fund may feel content in knowing that their gift was used to help supply food, fuel, rent, clothing—in fact, all the material needs of life for these needy families. Budgets are planned by our home economist, carefully detailed as to the various necessary expenditures, and our visitors help the families to live within them.

"In addition to these material needs, we are enabled to supply these families with the special kind of care and advice which will help solve their problems and eventually make them self-maintaining. Mothers will be trained by our home economist in regard to the purchase and preparation of food. Trade training will be given to many of the half-grown boys and girls in these families and to the handicapped. Special medical care will be given when needed. Better positions will be found for the wage-earners. Behavior problems will be adjusted with the aid of child guidance clinics, and many other difficulties smoothed away.

"In a great city, the organization of relief giving and of all the services that are organized for the poor, is a necessity. But that organization should attempt to achieve the simplicity and naturalness of neighborly help that is afforded in the little town, where every one knows every one else, where neighbors help each other in childbirth, in sickness, where neighbors bury the dead."

This sense of neighborliness has been manifest in the public response to the Annual Appeal. Contributions come from all ranks of society, and the amounts range from a few cents to checks for $5,000. Prominent and obscure share their interest in charity, and take a position in the list of daily contributions determined only by the alphabet. The spirit behind these gifts is revealed in the letters that accompany them. Among those received last year, for example, were the following:

L. F.—"When one thinks that the whole course of people's lives may be changed by securing the necessary funds for the coming year, one could hardly fail to contribute."

Anonymous—"For a long time I have been unable to do any work, due to a drawn-out struggle with a bad lung. Last Summer I sent some recipes to a household magazine, two of which were accepted, and I received a check for $2. The check was cashed and the two green bills carefully laid away in a sealed envelope. Because these two dollars were the first and only money I have earned in three years I have cherished them very tenderly, almost affectionately, and I determined to await a very special occasion before they were again allowed to rub shoulders with their less treasured brothers. I am now sending them to you."

W. J. K.—"There is so much distress in the world that those of us who are not under its shadow do not fully realize the extent of God's blessing in giving us immunity. In the humble spirit of thanksgiving, I am glad to be able to contribute."

EVERY CENT GOES TO THE NEEDIEST

The New York Times and the nine charity organizations that administer the Hundred Neediest Cases do so free of cost. There is no deduction of any kind, administrative or executive. Every cent contributed goes to the Neediest.

BYRD'S CONQUEST OF TWO POLES BY AIR

Adventures at the Opposite Ends of the Earth Were Different in the Emergencies that Were Faced and Overcome—the Antarctic Flight Promises To Make the More Valuable Contribution to Science

THE BEGINNINGS OF TWO GREAT ADVENTURES.
Commander Byrd's Plane at Spitsbergen Being Groomed for the North Pole Flight, His Ships at the Ross Ice Barrier, From Which He Flew to the South Pole, and His South Pole Plane, the Floyd Bennett.

By FITZHUGH GREEN.

COMMANDER BYRD is the only man who has looked down upon both Poles from the air. By his flights to the ends of the earth in May, 1926 (North Pole), and November, 1929 (South Pole), he has not only made his fame secure, but stands alone as our greatest air explorer. His flight across the Atlantic in 1927 was noteworthy, but did not test either his audacity or his ingenuity to the degree that his two polar flights have done.

While both polar flights were made over ice and snow in bitter arctic weather, they are comparable in curiously few ways. It is by their striking differences rather than by the dangers and obstacles in which they were similar that they demonstrated beyond a shadow of doubt Byrd's superb competence as a leader and his adaptability as a man. Adaptability and leadership are the two prime requisites of the explorer.

Consider only the high adventures of both flights, the dramatic moments, so to speak.

In 1926, when Byrd arrived at Spitsbergen he found no dock available and had to risk his only plane in a rush through drifting ice. A ski broke and he had a crack-up on his first take-off. Amundsen arrived in the Norge, forcing Byrd to dash off before he had planned to. One engine developed an oil leak near the Pole, threatening complete disaster in sight of his goal. He knocked his sextant off its table, giving himself the tough task of navigating home by sun compass.

In 1929, when his two ships proved inadequate at New Zealand, Byrd had to send one back from the ice barrier for more fuel and supplies—and it failed to reach him. He lost his second best plane in a storm within a few weeks after arrival. With twoscore inexperienced men he endured the long, black Antarctic night. He was forced down in a test flight early in November, nearly losing his one big plane as well as his own life. On the final historic flight, Nov. 28, he had to fight his way up a 12,000-foot barrier of mountains to reach the polar plateau. Yet he had time to digress on the way home and discover new land hitherto unseen by human eye.

Equal to Emergencies.

Not one of these emergencies in either polar expedition could be met by the same formula of reasoning and action. All required the nicest technical knowledge, often tact and always swift, bold decision. And not once in any of them did Byrd fail. It is a record without equal in the annals of exploration.

While each flight was of about sixteen hours' duration and covered roughly 1,600 miles in distance, a profound difference between the two lay in the fact that one (to the North Pole) lay over an ice-filled sea, while the other (to the South Pole) lay over an ice-buried land. (In this connection it is of interest that if a small sphere of putty, or some other viscous material, be spun rapidly it tends to assume the shape of a tetrahedron, with a base at one pole and a dihedral angle or point at the other. This would explain the fact that we have the flat-bottomed polar sea 2,000 miles in diameter at the North Pole and a high plateau about 1,000 miles in diameter at the South Pole).

From Spitsbergen to the North Pole Byrd flew over a chaotic field of floating ice; ice that had been torn by tides and crushed by impact of the floes against the land. Only occasional irregular lanes of level surface existed where old leads had frozen over, and these were mostly of "rubber ice," too weak to support his plane. It was a thousand to one odds that a forced landing would have meant a wrecked plane.

In contrast, nine-tenths of the route to the South Pole led over solid land, ice-covered, with crusted snow, which Byrd had already proved usable as a landing for his big plane. The other tenth of his route lay over a roughly crevassed area and glaciers.

While both of Byrd's bases, Arctic and Antarctic, have been near the seventy-ninth parallel of latitude the meteorological conditions between them and the Poles were totally different.

North polar climate is milder than south polar. Despite its ice, the sea warms the air around the North Pole. This is because sea temperature never gets below 28 degrees Fahrenheit. Of course, floes blanket the surface of the Arctic Ocean, but tides are continually opening leads through which the warmth of the water beneath diffuses into the air above. Records indicate that the average midwinter temperature at the North Pole is around minus 50 degrees Fahrenheit and at the South Pole minus 65 degrees.

This difference in temperature is intensified by Antarctic winds. The few icebergs in the Polar Sea merely stipple its surface. There are no land masses to disturb the even movement of the air, which is a descending gradient from high altitudes to low as it becomes heavier through chilling. In nearly four years in the Far North the writer never saw more than a half gale. High wind was a rarity, though gusty breezes blew frequently.

Antarctic Wind Currents.

In contrast, the Antarctic ice cap along Byrd's route is level for only about half the distance between his base and the South Pole. On either side of it lie mountain ranges. And at a point 450 miles south of Little America an ice-girt island of granite springs two miles into the sky. The summit of this island is capped, like Greenland, with a blue-white layer of compacted snow.

The same descending gradient of air falls upon the globe's southern axis as upon its northern. But contact with the polar plateau and the 15,000-foot peaks that surround it stirs the falling air into huge fierce eddies that sweep with hurricane force down upon the vast white plains that lie on either side. Thus it was that Mawson called his base the "Home of the Blizzard" and recorded many days when the wind averaged 60 to 100 miles an hour in force.

Wind movements in the north and south polar areas may be compared respectively to mountain streams that are shallow and deep. Water in a shallow stream merely ripples over small obstructions. But boulders in a deep stream cause violent whirlpools. In the north the "ripples" are stiff breezes. In the south, where the "boulders" are miles high, the "whirlpools" are blinding snow-filled hurricanes.

These savage Antarctic storms cause strange behavior of the barometer. Contrary to experience in other parts of the globe, Amundsen reported high winds when the glass went up and calm when it fell, just the opposite to the usual laws of atmospheric pressure.

The hazard of return in case the explorer's plane crashes nearly balances at the two Poles. While drifting ice and open leads may have fatally delayed Byrd, had he been forced down near the North Pole, he still might have killed seals on his way back or found muskox in Peary Land, and so reached the Greenland Eskimos.

Had he walked home from the South Pole he would have traveled in a white desert absolutely devoid of life. Against this, however, he had prudently laid out bases on the 400-mile line of march from his base to the mountains. Unless he had met with storms, such as caused the Scott party to perish, he probably would have been able to struggle home alive.

There is no question that Byrd's South Pole plane passed a harder test than the one in which he flew to the North Pole. Not only were the flying temperatures actually lower, but the big Ford had lain idle in its ice hangar through the long polar Winter.

Theoretically, there is no reason why any well-made machine should not lie up indefinitely. And yet any motorist knows that his gas engine does not work as well in the Spring if it has been left unused in the garage all Winter. Low temperatures have their effect on metals and lubricating oils. And while no permanent damage may be done, the mechanism inclines to be sluggish for some time after being put into use again.

Byrd's Ford plane was stored in a depression hollowed out in the surface of the ice barrier. For nearly six months its motor was not run. And when in early November (corresponding to our May) his mechanics went to work, they nursed their charge back to life in temperatures ranging from 30 to 60 degrees below zero. Perfect overhauling was well-nigh humanly impossible in such temperatures.

While Byrd has not mentioned it in his dispatches, this may explain the narrow shave he had from death in his forced landing on the Barrier in a test flight a few days before he hopped off for the Pole.

In 1926 he had his plane fully tested by its builders in the weeks just before he sailed from New York; and he was able to use it less than a month later in temperatures not greatly different from those in which the test had been held.

In justice to the South Pole plane we must remember that it was an all-metal type, and one of its three engines had 525 horsepower, or twice the pull of any of the North Pole engines. Moreover, its landing skis were of an advanced design and had been tried out on a flight to Greenly Island the Winter before Byrd left for the South. In other words, while the pure aeronautical problem Byrd faced in the South was stiffer than in the North, he had a stronger plane and was less rushed when time for action came.

Let it be noted in passing, that no one who has not worked on an engine in sixty-below-zero weather can know the heroic job Byrd's men did in getting his airplane ready for business last month.

The necessary load carried to the South Pole was greater than that to the North for several reasons. The big centre engine took more fuel. Food for four men (800 pounds to last three months) weighed more than rations for two. (Only Floyd Bennett accompanied Byrd to the North Pole.) The photographic equipment was about 150 pounds heavier. Against this extra weight was the alleviating factor that Byrd could—and did—stop at the base of the polar plateau and pick up extra fuel on his return.

It is difficult to compare the navigational problems of flying to the North and South Poles without going into technical details. Put simply, Byrd's polar navigation, like that of the mariner, consisted of two parts: astronomical, in which elevation of the sun above the horizon was measured by sextant and its bearing right or left of the meridian by sun compass; dead reckoning, in which the plane's estimated course and speed were plotted on the chart just about as an automobilist would plot them on a road map. Astronomical navigation is more accurate than dead reckoning, but is obviously impossible in thick weather.

Navigating toward the North Pole, Byrd had the advantage of light winds, which changed little during his flight, and of keeping an altitude around 3,000 to 5,000 feet so that he could easily estimate his ground speed. He had the disadvantage of crossing no landmarks on his 700 miles traverse over the polar floes, and so was unable to check his position at any point along his route.

Toward the South Pole he had varying winds that at one time carried him sharply off his course; and at another, through the mountain pass, buffeted him to and fro until sun sights were impossible. He had to vary his altitude from 2,000 to 14,000 feet, which made any estimate of ground speed difficult. There were even less data on the variation of the compass in the Antarctic than in the Arctic regions. Against these disadvantages he had the superlative advantage of making a landfall halfway to the Pole on mountains fixed by Scott and Amundsen. Thus both out and back he had a perfect check on his reckoning.

It is well to remember that Byrd's visits to the Poles by plane are not comparable to the visits afoot of his predecessors. Sledge parties traveled at five to twenty miles a day. They made their observations near noon and computed them out at night in the shelter of their sleeping bags. Byrd's numb figures took his sights while he was hurtling through the air at 100 miles per hour. He could not spend several days at the Pole estimating its position almost to a fathom, but had to diverge from his base course and swing in a wide circle about the infinitesimal and imaginary point on which our globe pivots.

Scenes at the Poles.

At the North Pole the ice he saw was not the ice on which Peary had stood. It looked the same and was to all intents and purposes the same; and yet it was merely floating trash ice, with the geodetic pole 1,500 fathoms beneath its alabaster surface. At the South Pole he must have actually seen the same solid mass of age-old snow to which Scott's dying men had staggered, weakly sobbing out their disappointment when they found the deserted camp of the Norwegians who had been there first. Yet even here the crust was newly laid.

In both cases Byrd stood less chance of error than other explorers for the reason that his aim was to encompass the goal within his line of flight and vision. At 2,000 feet his range of visibility was at least fifty miles for any sizable landmark. This, with the wide circle he cruised in near the Pole, gave him proper claim to having reached it. That he did not see Amundsen's mark in the South was to be expected, because seventeen years of Antarctic snowfall would have buried a two-story house. That in 1926 he saw no trace of Peary's 1909 camp was chiefly because north polar floes are ever on the move.

It was a noteworthy achievement that Byrd sped north again toward Little America and found by use of spherical geometry his pass through the mountains 300 miles away. But one must confess that this does not compare with his striking feat in 1926 when he flew a bee-line from the Pole to the north point of Spitsbergen without a sextant, using only his sun and magnetic compasses. But then we must remember that Byrd is nearly our oldest aerial navigator and has actually invented some of the instruments that he uses.

The relative value of what he has gained on his two polar flights is all in favor of that to the South Pole. In the North his results were largely negative; he proved that the Pole was no different from that reported by Peary; he showed that there was no land in the vicinity of the Pole and in a wide band of polar sea to and from the Pole; and he confirmed reports of the utter lifelessness of the trackless desert that covers the top of the world.

However, in his Antarctic flight just ended he has really done a surprising lot of things that are important to aviation, aerial exploration and to science. For instance, he has demonstrated that a large plane can be wintered beyond the sun line and still prove workable early in the Spring; he has twice landed his plane on the innermost reaches of the Barrier; he has proved that modern aircraft can battle its way through conditions of altitude, temperature, wind and visibility that seemed more like the moon than our hospitable terrestrial sphere; he has photograph d a set of aerial maps of areas unseen by human eye, which no one believed could yet be taken. And, most commendable of all, he boldly took time for a side traverse and discovered a whole range of mountains in addition to his successful polar flight.

In the flood of praise that the press has meted out to Byrd, one point seems to have been overlooked, and it is another point in which his Antarctic voyage is superior to that of 1926. He has made his spectacular polar flight, the one which he felt most obligated to make, so early in the Antarctic season that he has left his scientific staff many precious weeks for work before the party will have to return. And if shorter flights into unknown territory are now made, it can well be said that Byrd will have done two or three times what he ever dared claim he could do. Indeed, for all the thrill of his polar victory, this subsequent work may in actual value prove the most valuable of all.

Comparison of the two flights is not complete without comparing the two figures of the man himself: that in 1926 and again in 1929.

In 1926 he was not a novice in Arctic flying. He had flown several thousand miles over Smith Sound and Ellesmere Land in August, 1925. He had learned first-hand what the airplane was capable of doing in the Far North. Moreover, his troubles with fog, snow, bitter winds and limited equipment had given him a deep respect for the explorer's handicaps.

His flight to the North Pole was, in a considerable degree, simply a continuation of his Greenland work of the previous year. The navigation was more difficult; but near enough to what he had been doing for years so that he was never bothered.

Lessons of Three Years.

In 1929 we find a far more finished product flying poleward. In the three years that elapsed since his North Pole flight, Byrd had learned a lot. His wretched luck in not reaching Paris first was through no fault of his. But he took the bitter disappointment like a good sport and gave Lindbergh his full measure of admiration. His experiences as a hero, lecturer, banqueteer and target of many cranks were much more instructive than pleasant.

The tribulations of organizing a big expedition in New York taxed his physical and nervous strength to the utmost. Had he not taken perfect care of himself and been gifted with a strong constitution he would have broken under the inhuman strain that was put upon him.

Without any real experience he landed a large party of men on the ice barrier nearly a year ago and commanded them successfully through the Winter. As the inside story of a polar expedition is never written, we can only guess at the tact, self-control, forbearance and moral courage that he must have used to succeed as he has done. Suffice it to say that only the finest character can survive such a test.

When he hopped off for the South Pole it was not the Byrd of 1926 who gave the word to go, but a new Byrd—a man who had surmounted three hard years of ill-luck, disappointment, unceasing strain and anxiety, and, worst of all, the deadly drug of notoriety.

The eighteenth annual appeal for the Hundred Neediest Cases is made today.

HARD WORK GAVE BYRD HIS FAME

The Conqueror of Two Poles Had Many Struggles and Disappointments

IN our typically American way we have given Commander Byrd unstinted praise for his first crossing of the North Pole by air, his crossing of the Atlantic Ocean in a multi-motored plane, and now his first flight to the South Pole. And then in an equally typical American way we further glorify his success in headline style by assuming it to be the meteoric rise of a brave young genius. Some day America is going to learn that the old definition of genius is the truest one—that genius is the power of painstaking effort long sustained.

Popular belief to the contrary, Richard E. Byrd long had his "struggle in the garret"; he has many times suffered the "outrageous buffets of fortune"; he has known despair in a dozen different forms; and he has put in twenty hard years of effort to reach the perilous summit of his present fame.

Behind his own ungrudging toil is his background of good blood. The term "aristocracy" has lost much because it has so often been synonymous with profligacy. But in its precise sense the word "aristocrat" defines a worthy member of the ruling class. Byrd's forebears were aristocrats in the better sense.

The first American Byrd was bluff old Colonel William, who landed on the shores of the James River in 1671. He was leader, driver and pioneering gentleman. Then there was Francis Otway Byrd, a fiery Royalist. "Damn you, come on!" he bellowed in 1775 to a score of Yankee rebels against his English King. Byrds fought in the Revolutionary War, on both sides in the Civil War, and in the Spanish-American War. In the late World War, Captain Tom Byrd, Richard's younger brother, was officially decorated for his help in breaking the Hindenburg line.

The late Richard Evelyn Byrd, Commander Byrd's father, was a successful lawyer and an orator. He could have had the Governorship of Virginia in his day. He chose rather to leave it to the younger generation, and it ultimately came around to his son Harry, who has just ceased to fill the office.

The Man Who Has Seen the Two Poles From the Air.

Eleanor Bolling Byrd, mother of Tom, Dick and Harry, is a rare woman who has long been famous for her common sense and character, as well as for her beauty. In her girlhood she read the daily tales of the Greely tragedy: nineteen men dead of cold and starvation in the cruel North. So when, one day in 1926, she received word that her son Dick had hopped off from Spitsbergen on his long and dangerous flight toward the North Pole, she knew the fate that awaited him if he failed.

"Of course I realized what it meant!" she exclaimed with pride when questioned later. "How else could I appreciate what my boy was doing?"

She rested quietly that afternoon with her son Harry Byrd at the Governor's mansion. Presently Harry Byrd could stand it no longer and telephoned his friend Stewart Bryan of the local press. He burst into the room:

"Dick's back at the ship, mother!" he cried. "But they don't know whether he succeeded or not."

"I know," said Mrs. Byrd quietly.

The traits of character that have taken Byrd to the Ross Ice Barrier in 1929 were forming thirty years ago. He was 9 years old then, living in the quaint old town of Winchester, Va. He had a happy home, two lively young brothers, an adoring mother and a proud father. But even at the age of 9 he had begun to "squirm" at the narrowness of his horizon. He went camping. He was a great walker and liked to hunt. For three years he squirmed.

BYRDS AND POLES —AND SO FORTH

Sober Second Thoughts on Things and Kings And, Once Every So Often, Cabbages

By L. H. ROBBINS.

The Neediest.

THERE is a maze of circumstance,
A labyrinth of hope deferred,
A dreary cavern of despair
Where children's laughter is not heard,
Though many a child is captive there.

Vain striving for deliverance!
As in a trap, as in a cage,
As in some evil spirit's thrall,
Children, brave mothers, broken age
Grope in the dark until they fall.

There is a maze of circumstance,
A labyrinth where evermore
Brave hearts grown faint in want and doubt
Helplessly search. For them no door
Save one that opens from without.

Down there you can't go east or west to save your life. The only way to go for that worthy purpose is north. You can't go south for the Winter, either. Perhaps it is just as well that the South Pole is not habitable. The one-direction life would be confusing. There is confusion just in trying to think about it at a safe distance. SENATOR SULLIVAN —AND SOME OTHERS

A Few Footnotes on Some Personalities Whose Names Have Appeared in the Headlines

By S. T. WILLIAMSON.

AT last an Irish brogue has come to the floor of the United States Senate. It is not safe to say that a brogue, or anything else, has never been found in the Senate; for the Senate is a historic body and strange things are likely to happen there (and do). But not even the most irreconcilable Senator would contradict the statement that if ever a brogue did come to the Senate one of the last places it would be expected to come from would be the Wyoming cattle country. That is like the Senate: if it had to have a brogue it would go to such a place as Wyoming for it.

Well, it has a good one from the usually smiling lips of Patrick J. Sullivan of Casper, who has been appointed Senator from Wyoming to fill out the term of the late Senator Francis Warren until a special election can be held. As Patrick J. Sullivan the new Senator is hardly recognizable to those who have attended Republican party gatherings in years past. As Patrick J. Sullivan he is just another Sullivan. At meetings of the Republican National Committee, at Republican National conventions and at the White House for at least a generation he is Pat Sullivan, and as Pat Sullivan he is already known to most of the membership of the Senate.

Forty years ago Pat Sullivan, fresh from Ireland, went to Wyoming. Since then he has herded sheep, shepherded votes, prospected for oil and stood by the Grand Ould Party. As a sheep herder he was successful, oil has gushed for him, and thus far in the twentieth century he has been Republican National Committeeman from Wyoming. Now at 65—his birthday is St. Patrick's Day—he is appointed Senator by the Governor of Wyoming. When a generation has known him simply as Pat Sullivan, the title of Senator will rest lightly on his shoulders. Forty years in Wyoming have not polished off the edges of his brogue. He is never in lack of company.

He comes to a Senate that is becoming somewhat drab and lacking in picturesqueness. Quite a giant of an Irishman he is, which makes all the more slender the thin little cane he carries. After listening to him for a moment, there is no question about his picturesqueness or his likableness; and there will be many people who will take friendly satisfaction in the sight next week of an Irishman from Wyoming standing before a Vice President who once wore an Indian blanket and taking the oath of a United States Senator.

A SULLIVAN is in the Senate, and these are big days for the Hurleys, too. One Hurley has put forth an idea for the prevention of war; another Hurley—a Patrick J., if you please, like Senator Sullivan—may head the War Department. Thus Mars and Pax each are attended by a Hurley.

If Edward Nash Hurley, successful manufacturer and business man of Chicago, were a Republican, the chances are that he would have been in government service at some time during the last three Republican administrations. He is one of those unique business men who believe that men of affairs should engage in some form of government service. Most of his associates know that they could do a better job than the politicians and let it go at that. Mr. Hurley was a dollar-a-year man during the war, who spent $3,000,000,000 as head of the United States Shipping Board. He came to the conclusion that private enterprise could have built the ships for less money.

Now Mr. Hurley believes private enterprise could be just as efficient in maintaining peace as it might have been in carrying on war. He has named business men and bankers occupying key positions in other nations whose influence, or threatened boycott, together would be sufficient to discourage any nation breathless for war.

While his namesake prepared a list of industrialists who might prevent war by refusing to sell war material, it has been Patrick J. Hurley's job as Assistant Secretary of War to line up manufacturers whose plants could be devoted to the production of war supplies, if needed. Now that there is a vacancy in the Cabinet made by the death of Secretary of War Good, Colonel Hurley has been mentioned as a likely successor.

There is romance in the career of Patrick J. Hurley. At 16 he was a young cowhand in what was then the Indian Territory. The Spanish War came on and he was enlisted in Troop L of Roosevelt's Rough Riders until his age was discovered. Young Hurley made a discovery at the same time: That an education might get him away from the cows.

College and law school followed, and at 29 he was attorney for the Choctaw Indian tribe, a job which meant many visits to Washington. There was no difficulty in getting into the World War. Tall, straight as an arrow, hard as nails at 36, he won a commission and then advancement overseas to the rank of Colonel. A citation for "distinguished and exceptional gallantry" in action the day before the armistice and a Distinguished Service Medal for his tact in negotiations with the Duchy of Luxembourg are a part of his record. He knows the army and the army knows him.

OUT of the West and back again last week came and went Professor Robert Andrews Millikan, head of the California Institute of Technology. Smooth-shaven, ruddy-faced and business-like, he might be a banker or an industrialist instead of one of the world's foremost physicists.

Both in work and in his personal contacts, Professor Millikan deals with extremes. He meets clergymen on their own ground—he's a Congregational minister's son—to unite science and religion. He addresses steel makers and talks convincingly to dividend hunters of the need for larger endowments for research in pure science, which pays no dividends. He makes speeches before chambers of commerce in their own language.

And why shouldn't he? A man who isolates and measures the smallest known particles—particles so minute as to be as far beneath human comprehension as astronomical space is beyond it—and in them sees answers to riddles of universes must have a versatile understanding. When he isolated the electron he was dealing with divisions of matter having diameters of less than one ten-thousandth of the diameter of the atom—a process which bears some resemblance to the song which ultimately conducts researches among the whiskers of the flea in the hair of the tail of the dog. Next he proved the existence of cosmic rays, rays which are all around us yet so powerful that they can penetrate through six feet of lead, whereas X-rays are strong enough to pass through not more than a half inch of the same substance.

A dozen years and more were required to nail down the facts of the cosmic rays, and Professor Millikan is not through with them yet, as he revealed last month at Princeton, when he declared that these rays may yield the secret of creation of matter. Night and day this tireless researcher devotes to his task. "When he was engaged in his atomic work," one of Professor Millikan's assistants once said, "he would come in from a lecture at midnight in his evening clothes, and without changing would labor for hours in his laboratory, endeavoring to measure electrons on oil droplets less than a thousandth of a millimeter in diameter."

The eighteenth annual appeal for the Hundred Neediest Cases is made today.

FROM KILL VAN KULL AND STIRLING TO TARBES AND NIHAU

INTERESTING PLACES IN THE NEWS OF THE WORLD

SHRINES to the memories of gallant men, to France's great war hero and to the Scots who fell at one of their most celebrated victories over the English are to be established at two places in Europe. A Cardinal from New York has been visiting an island fortified at the behest of an early Pope as an outpost against the infidel Turk. Another island, in the far Pacific, has had little of troubles which usually beset mankind. A famous New England shipbuilding centre has turned out another "queen" of the Atlantic fishing fleet. These are among the places mentioned in the news of the week.

The site of the Battle of Bannockburn, Borestone Field, at Stirling, Scotland, is to become a national park. Here is was, according to Robert Burns, that Bruce said to his men:

Scots, wha hae wi' Wallace bled,
Scots, wham Bruce has aften led,
Welcome to your gory bed,
Or to victory.

Around Stirling much of Scotland's colorful and romantic history and legend is centred. In 1297 the rebellion headed by Wallace, Douglas and Bruce defeated the English there. Stirling Castle was captured by Edward I of England in 1304 after a siege of three months, but retaken by Bruce after Bannockburn, ten years later. Several of the Jameses were born there, and in the castle is the Douglas Room, where James II, in 1452, stabbed the rebellious Earl of Douglas. From the castle magnificent views can be obtained of Ben Lomond, Ben Venue and Ben Ledi; of the Bridge of Allan, the Abbey Craig and Wallace Monument, of Cambuskenneth Abbey and the "Links of the Forth."

A national museum of relics of the late Marshal Foch is to be established at the farm at Tarbes, France, where the great warrior was born. Tarbes lies in a rich plain on the left bank of the Adour River, and is the capital of the Department of the Hautes-Pyrenees. In the Middle Ages it was important as the capital of the county of Bigorre, and was occupied by the English from 1360 to 1406. It suffered greatly in the religious wars of the sixteenth century, and now trades in the excellent Pyreneean horses. Its chief sight is now the Jardin Massey, planted with exotic trees and threaded with streamlets, and containing a museum with sculptures and natural history and art collections.

Cardinal Hayes of New York recently paid a visit to the little island of Rhodes, in the Aegean Sea, a place famous in ancient times for its religious background and culture. In its golden days Rhodes was a centre of pictorial and plastic art. Here was the Colossus erected by Charles of Lindus, 105 feet high, which stood (not, as fiction relates, astride the harbor) for fifty-six years until an earthquake destroyed it in 224 B. C. Its fragments were sold by Saracen conquerors in 656, about 900 camels being employed to take them away. In 1309 it was captured by the Knights Hospitallers of St. John at the instigation of the Pope and the Genoese, and converted into a fortress outpost against the Turks. Legend peopled the ancient Rhodes with skillful workers in metal, the "Telchines," and with bold navigators, "Children of the Sun." Three Homeric cities were built there by Dorians, Lindus, Ialysus and Camirus, which belonged to the League of Six Cities.

The Flow, sister ship to the Ebb, was recently launched at Bath, Me. These two vessels are the "queens" of the Boston fishing fleet "forty-fathom" trawlers, the last word in luxuriousness and speed. Their fashioning echoes the days of the wooden ships, when Bath was noted far and wide as a shipbuilding centre. It still ranks first in Maine for this industry. Historically, it was a number of other "firsts." In 1607, on the site of Bath, George Popham and a company from London and Plymouth established the first New England colony, which held the first New England town service of the Church of England, and built the first American ship, the Virginia. Here, likewise, was held the first New England town meeting. Popham was the first Englishman to be buried in New England soil. In 1605 Champlain claimed this region for France, but by 1652 Maine had been annexed by Massachusetts.

A United States Army airplane from Newark selected as its landing place the icy waters of the Kill van Kull, the channel separating Staten Island from New Jersey. This strip of water was described by Robert Juet of Limehouse, in writing of Henry Hudson's third voyage, in 1610, as "a narrow River, to the Westward, betweene two Ilands. The Lands they told us were as pleasant with Grasse and Flowers, and goodly Trees, as ever they had seene, and very sweet smells came from them." The Kill (from the Dutch word meaning channel) was claimed by both New York and New Jersey for many years, and the question of ownership was settled in 1834 by a line run through the middle of the channel.

Marooned for more than two months in the Arctic wastes of Northern Canada, a half dozen members of the MacAlpine exploring party have at last reached The Pas, Manitoba, Canada, being brought south by airplane. The Pas is a great communications centre of North Central Canada, and it is from here that the new railway runs to Hudson Bay, taking grain to Liverpool in Summer by a shorter route. The Pas was an ancient Hudson's Bay Company trading post, situated at the confluence of the Pas or Pasquia River with the Saskatchewan. The district abounds in fine lumber, fish and big game, while gold has been discovered near.

London newspapers have been discussing a rumor to the effect that the fertile, oval plains of Kashmir, India, may again come into the hands of Great Britain. This "Eden of Asia," entirely surrounded by the lofty, snowy peaks of ranges of the Karakoram and Himalaya, was in early days ruled by Scythian Hindu Princes, then conquered by the Tartars. In 1856 it was taken by the Great Mogul Akbar, and in 1819 annexed by the Maharajah Ranjit Singh. Britain held it for a time, but sold it to the Singh dynasty in 1846. A yearly tribute of six Kashmir shawls has since that time been given to British sovereigns.

A fiction-like report comes from Dunedin, New Zealand. Thirteen years ago Patrick Toohill of that city was given up for dead in the World War. He recently returned home. Dunedin is a thoroughly modern city, founded only in 1848 by an association of members of the Free Church of Scotland. It grew rapidly, especially after the discovery of gold in its vicinity in 1861. It is built among steep hills and overlooks an excellent harbor.

A land seemingly without problems of any sort has at last been discovered. It has no prohibition, no traffic jams, no radios, cigarettes, stores, dogs, jail or police. This is the Island of Nihau, west of the Barking Sands on Kauai, in the Hawaiian group, owned by a Briton, who runs it as a sheep, cattle and turkey ranch. Nihau is only 20 miles long and 5 miles wide, and its 130 inhabitants seem content.

American aviation is continuing its conquest of foreign lands, and a prominent concern from the United States is to establish an airplane factory at Los Cerrillos, the airport of Santiago, Chile. Air lines are particularly needed in this "shoestring republic," as communication between the interior and the coast is difficult unless one flies over the lofty Andes. Santiago, about 100 miles from the Pacific, is 1,700 feet above sea level, lying in a flat basin surrounded by ragged, blue mountains. Around one side flows the Mapocho River,

IN MANCHURIA CHINA AGAIN FACES A CRISIS

Soviet Russia Adds One More Chapter to the Long Story of Railway Diplomacy in the Far East

By NATHANIEL PEFFER.

ALARUMS of war from Manchuria are stilled again, dying down as suddenly as they rose. The Russian Army which had swooped across the Siberian border into Manchuria and appeared to be making straight for Harbin, capital of one of the Manchurian provinces, receded almost as quickly as it advanced. Whether it really intended to penetrate deeply into Chinese territory, it made the Chinese authorities in Manchuria believe it did. And the ultimatum from Moscow which had been dealt with so cavalierly in July was accepted expeditiously.

The Manchurian régime did not even wait for Nanking, the official capital of the country, to act. It accepted on its own authority. In fact, news of its capitulation was first made public by Moscow and denied by Nanking. Subsequently C. T. Wang, Foreign Minister of the Nationalist Government, officially confirmed the departure of delegates from Manchuria to treat with Soviet Russian representatives.

The result of the negotiations was foreshadowed by the circumstances under which they were entered. The principal demand of Soviet Russia, the restoration of the Chinese Eastern Railway to its status before the Chinese seized it last July, was conceded. The rest is unessential.

Thus another chapter is written in the tortuous story of railway diplomacy in Manchuria—a story the high lights of which have been wars and near-wars, two of them in the last six months. And thus incidentally China suffers its first reverse in its fight to recover the rights lost in the period of its helplessness before the combined aggressions of the strong powers of the West.

Thirty-five years ago, after Japan had given the world startling evidence of its prowess by conquering China and then followed the world's example by seeking to carve out a piece of China, Russia intervened and compelled Japan to renounce the spoils, which happened to be a part of Manchuria, thus ushering that unhappy region into the sphere of international rivalries.

Russia's Reward.

Russia then exacted of China a reward for its services. The reward consisted of the right to build a railway across North Manchuria to Vladivostok, thus materially shortening the line of the Transsiberian Railroad and incidentally giving Russia control of North Manchuria. This right was later extended to include a branch line direct to the coast in South Manchuria, thus giving Russia also control of South Manchuria, a springboard into China proper and a weapon pointed directly at Japan. The railway was the Chinese Eastern Railway, which has since figured much and often in Far Eastern chronicles. Officially it was a joint Russian and Chinese railway and there may or may not have been Chinese officials, but they never were indiscreet enough to voice any opinions, let alone exercise authority.

Thus it remained for ten years, while Japan girded for vengeance and a place in the sun. It won both, and by way of token wrested from Russia the South Manchurian ports which had been built with Russian funds as terminals for the railway, and all of the railway which runs from Dairen on the coast to Changchun, some 400 miles—China being an interested spectator. But the main line across North Manchuria to Siberia and that part of the branch line which runs from Harbin to Changchun remained Russian—actually Russian and nominally Russian-Chinese.

Amends to China.

Thus it remained until after the World War. Then Bolshevist Russia came forth repentant and offering to make amends for imperialist sins. It offered to China to renounce the gains of the days of Czarism and empire, and did actually renounce much, but not all. It did not renounce the Chinese Eastern Railway, the most valuable asset acquired in the days of empire. A new agreement was concluded in 1924 whereby China received a more active voice in the management of the railway, but while half the directors were to be Chinese, the manager and one of two assistant managers was still to be Russian. In effect, the deciding voice was still Russian.

Thus again it remained until July of this year; but meanwhile much had happened in the Far East. China abandoned the rôle of disinterested spectator in the determination of its own fate. It did so, aided and abetted by Soviet Russia. "Down with Imperialism" became the catchword for all educated and semi-educated Chinese, and Russia, then allied with Nationalist South China, helped materially to propagate the catchword. The machinery of anti-imperialist propaganda was mainly devised by the Russians, although the sentiment would have been there with or without the Russians.

The Chinese acted as well as shouted. They began to dispossess the powers of the privileges and territorial positions acquired when China was humble and yielding. The powers protested, threatened, made angry gestures, and acquiesced. They had no recourse, not being in the mood for punitive expeditions. Then Nationalist China broke with Russia for a combination of reasons, among them that it was learning to be skeptical even of its friends when they got too close. And then China proceeded to apply its convictions on imperialism in North Manchuria—convictions which Soviet Russia had helped so conscientiously to foster.

Four months ago Chinese troops surrounded the office of the Chinese Eastern Railway in Harbin, the political and financial centre of North Manchuria, arrested the Russian manager, deported several of the Russian directors and other officials, and took over the railway itself. It was an unconcealed act of expropriation and the climax of a series of acts all tending to the same effect. But while the others had been merely sapping operations, this was open attack and seizure.

China's official excuse was that the Russians had been guilty of carrying on Communist propaganda, an ironical excuse inasmuch as China had availed itself of that propaganda when it helped China against others. No doubt the Chinese also reasoned that the great powers, including Russia, were in no position to take retaliatory measures. Russia, they argued, was still an outcast among the nations and could spare no resources or energies from the task of consolidating the revolution, and besides it could ill afford to abandon the rôle of conspicuous contrast to the devouring empires of Europe and America.

A Touch of Irony.

It is one of the nicer ironies in a part of the world where internationl relations are chronically ironical that Communist Russia, defender of the downtrodden East against voracious empires, should be the first to strike a blow in China to preserve interests which are a classic example of imperialistic aggression.

Britain surrendered its concessions at Hankow and Kiuklang with philosophic resignation. Japan sent an expedition into Shantung, but cleared out in a year after severe punishment in the form of a boycott. Britain, America, France, Japan and every other power gave up control of China's tariff after the Chinese had proceeded to levy import tariff duties as they liked any way. And emboldened by its successes, China has given notice that it will abrogate extraterritoriality on Jan. 1, 1930, whether the powers agree or not. The powers have argued and protested, but they have submitted.

Not so, Soviet Russia, repentant of the sins of the Czars. Three days after the Chinese had seized the Chinese Eastern Railway, Moscow dispatched an ultimatum to China, an ultimatum couched in all the orthodox bristling formulas of the most punctilious nineteenth century diplomacy. It demanded a return to the status quo or it would take measures "for the protection of the lawful rights of the Soviet Republic." China replied with counter-accusations and counter-demands, pointing out, with some truth, that Russia had not abided by the 1924 agreement in that there had not been equal division of jobs on the railway as stipulated. Russia severed diplomatic relations. Before it could take further steps the United States Government intervened under the provisions of the Four Power pact signed at Washington in 1922 and the Kellogg anti-war pact, which both China and Russia had signed. China agreed not to resort to arms except in self-defense; Russia made no official commitment but substantially said the same.

For a time a fog hung over Manchuria. There were informal negotiations for a settlement, though at times one party announced that negotiations were in progress while the other said it knew of no negotiations. Russia demanded the restoration of the director who had been evicted. China was reported to have offered to install a Russian director but not the same one, and was also reported to have refused to install any Russian director at all. And there they remained at impasse, with Germany, which had taken over the rights of each country on the other's territory, trying to bring the two together in Berlin.

Meanwhile Russia continued to send troops further East into Siberia toward Manchuria. By a coincidence the commander was said to be General Galen, who had been sent to Canton by Moscow five years before to help train the Nationalist Army. The Chinese also moved troops to the border for purpose of defense. There were minor clashes and reports of many more, probably not true. Raids were made across the frontier, each side accusing the other of taking the offensive. Each believed the other to be bluffing, and to a great extent both were right. Both were italicizing their demands, especially Russia.

Then Russia struck in full force. The Red Army pushed into Manchurian territory, though it was not clear just how far. That the Russians did so effectively is quite clear, however, since the Chinese fled before them, soldiers and civilians alike. In fact, the Chinese appear to have fled before they arrived, with the result that the Russian advance was reported further than it had reached.

Russia's blow had the effect it was intended to have. It jarred the Chinese into a realization that the Chinese Eastern Railway was not going by default and that there was a controversy in Manchuria which had not yet been settled. China formally protested to the League of Nations against Russia's invasion as an act of war and asked the League to intervene, restrain and punish Russia. But while the Foreign Minister of the Nationalist Government of China was acting thus from Nanking the local government of Manchuria in Mukden, much closer to the danger than Nanking, acted more directly and practically. It sent word to Moscow that it was ready to accept Moscow's terms.

Confusion Over the Outcome.

It is reflective of conditions in contemporary China that for days there was confusion as to just what China had done, what action it had taken, if any, and what the status of China, Russia and the railway was. Moscow said Mukden had surrendered and was satisfied, though the legally recognized government of China is in Nanking. Nanking announced that it stood on its offer of last July, which was to negotiate for a settlement without any commitments in advance. Mukden said nothing officially, but let it be known, first, that it had accepted Moscow's terms, then that it had not, and then that it almost had. But Mukden had, and Nanking accepted the accomplished fact with as much grace as it could. Foreign Minister C. T. Wang submitting his resignation because he had "lost face."

How could Mukden commit the country in diplomatic action affecting China's foreign relations when it is only the capital of a local area? The explanation lies in the peculiar relations between Manchuria and the rest of China, and in the unique situation of contemporary China as a whole.

Manchuria has always been a no man's land, literally so until the last few years, for the vast expanse of plain was almost unpopulated. But its strategic and economic importance was recognized as soon as the Far East became an arena of international rivalry. South Manchuria was marked out as Japan's sphere, North Manchuria as Russia's. But juridically it was Chinese territory, as the homeland of the Manchu dynasty which ruled China until 1911, and the Chinese were becoming no less interested in Manchuria. While the powers got concessions and poured in money, China poured in immigrants from the overpopulated provinces of China proper. Manchuria is no longer uninhabited, and with economic development it has become rich.

As the Chinese population and wealth increased, Manchuria's political importance was enhanced. In Mukden emerged a one-time brigand leader destined to play a great rôle in China, one Chang Tso-lin. A vast amount of legend accumulated about Chang Tso-lin, but that he was able and forceful as well as ruthless is conceded. He built up an army and a war chest, and as Peking began to dwindle both in prestige and power after the World War he began to draw closer to the Great Wall. For a few years he took part in successive civil wars, increasing his material resources and political influence. Finally, in 1926, he moved down on Peking and remained as dictator for two years.

Chang Tso-lin was dictator of Manchuria, Peking and the region immediately surrounding the former capital, but never of China. Throughout the country the tide was moving against men of the type of Chang, and in the Summer of last year the Nationalist Army, which had already won half the country, launched a drive northward toward Peking.

Chang's army fled, partly because the younger men in subordinate commands were at heart with the Nationalists, and Chang offered to retire without putting up a battle in the capital itself. He left late one night on a special train with his concubines, his retinue and no one knows how much wealth. The next morning, as his train crossed a railway bridge outside Mukden, his car was blown up by bombs and he was killed. Who set the bomb has never been learned, but after the subject had been hotly debated in the Japanese Diet several officers were cashiered and a Cabinet was overthrown.

Chang Tso-lin was succeeded at the head of the Manchurian Government by his son, Chang Hsueh-liang. Young Chang's sympathies had long been recognized and he moved at once for unification with the Nationalist Government at Nanking. Japan formally protested and sought to restrain him, even making threats, but he persisted, and after a few months the Nationalist party flag was flying over Mukden, the three Manchurian provinces went under the jurisdiction of the government at Nanking and Chang Hsueh-liang put himself under Nanking's orders.

Chang Hsueh-liang and his advisers, older men of the olden days, were sincere but they were not reckless. They put themselves under Nanking's orders, but they were to execute the orders. The officials of Manchuria were appointed by Nanking, but from lists submitted by Mukden. And the old Manchurian Army remained under Chang Hsouh-liang's command. In short, Manchuria became an integral part of China, but an autonomous part.

The origin of the seizure of the Chinese Eastern Railway last July has never been learned, but all the evidence is that it was locally planned and carried out. Nanking desired the same end, but would have moved more cautiously, having more experience in making daring coups in foreign relations without the force to back them up. But after the step had been taken it assumed responsibility for the negotiations with Russia.

Manchuria Takes the Lead.

Nanking is more experienced, but its attitude toward Russia was necessarily more academic. It was further away. And when Russia took vigorous reprisal two weeks ago, Nanking could stand pat in diplomatic notes, but Manchuria was under the Russian guns. And Manchuria, by virtue of its substantial autonomy and because it was in danger, took counsel of discretion and yielded while Nanking was still manoeuvring.

Politically speaking the relation between Manchuria and the Government of China is rather metaphysical. So are all inner political relations in China. The Nationalist Government proclaims itself the government of a unified China. And so it is, with the reservation of autonomy for all local areas in which there are military leaders with strong armies. Nanking issues the orders, but they execute them, and Nanking knows fairly clearly which orders will be executed and which not.

When Nanking miscalculates or decides to challenge the local leader there is war. While there have been many other complicating factors, fundamentally this is the explanation for the war which has been in progress in the Yangtse Valley in the last few weeks. Pressed by the exigencies of foreign relations and financial needs, which can be met only by a reorganized and unified country, Nanking has been trying to effect genuine centralization. Feng Yu-hsiang and the group of Generals allied with him were unwilling to surrender their prerogatives as autonomous leaders. On their side also was the argument that one faction in Nanking was attempting to interpret unification as factional dictatorship. There were vain efforts for compromise, then they clashed.

Financial exhaustion on both sides, especially on the side of the rebel Generals, together with the sudden threat from Russia, led to a cessation of hostilities. It is also reported that the payment of handsome sums to the rebel Generals by Nanking was a motivating cause. There was at any rate no clear military decision.

But as Nanking had won at Chengchow, on the Peking-Hankow Railway, and time was on the side of Nanking, since its financial resources are greater, the main advantage was Nanking's. It remains in power after the most serious challenge to its authority since the Nationalist Government was established last year, which in itself represents success.

The road to unification in China is long, steep and bestrewn with obstructions. It cannot be traversed in one year, perhaps not in ten.

CABLE SHIPS HANDLE A BIG TASK

Seven Vessels Are Now at Work Repairing the Submarine Strands Broken Recently by the Great Earthquake

THE earthquake that shook the North Atlantic coast on Nov. 18 caused unprecedented damage to the cable lines lying along its course. Ten of a total of twenty-one transatlantic cables were so badly damaged that they were made unavailable for communication, and cable service was maintained, with slight delays, only by using the remaining cables at top speed twenty-four hours a day and by transferring some of the burden to the transatlantic radio.

The task of replacing the broken cables is now in the hands of the repair ships owned by the three major cable companies—the Western Union, Commercial Cables and the French Telegraph Cable Company. Most of these ships, like wrecking trains on railroads, are held ready at their depots to sail at an hour's notice. The ships were on their way from Halifax, their home port, to the scene of the recent disturbance long before the occurrence of the earthquake was generally known. To assist the ordinary force of five ships in this unusual emergency, the Western Union and Commercial Cables each ordered another to be rushed from England to this side of the Atlantic so that there are now seven ships working to repair the cables.

The work of these repair ships is dangerous and unique. Working at top speed and at the mercy of the seas, which in the present instance have proved unfavorable, they are confronted with the problem, first of locating a one-inch band lying miles below the surface—a difficult task even with the help of the electricians on the shore—and then of raising this huge mass, which a moment before had seemed aggravatingly small, to the side of the ship. Such work cannot be performed in rough weather when the weight of the cable attached to the ship prevents it from riding heavy seas smoothly and when there is always the danger that the waves, twisting and buffeting the cable, might break it again in another spot and double the work. A large part of the time the repair ships must ride, helpless, waiting for the weather to clear.

The repair ships themselves are floating electrical shops, completely equipped to meet any technical problem which may arise in their work, and containing stored in their holds a sufficient supply of cable to repair any break. At their sterns are placed a varying number of large wheels for paying out the cable, and arranged upon the deck, which is kept clear for that purpose, are a number of brakes controlling the speed with which the cable is permitted to drop over the stern. These wheels and brakes are so arranged from prow to stern that it is possible for the ship to "run under" the cable, that is, to become a sort of huge movable pulley advancing under its own power while the cable passes over it, slowly enough to permit the electricians to look for "faults."

Breaks in the cables are, of course, due to other things beside earthquakes in comparatively shallow water. Such breaks occur about once a month and are usually easy to repair. Since precautions have been taken against the attack of the Teredo worm—amollusc that used to bore holes in the unprotected cables—by sheathing cables with heavy steel wires wound spirally, it seldom happens that cables in deep sea break except as a result of earthquakes. Up to about 500 fathoms, the steel weighted trawls of fishermen may be expected to hit the cables and either injure or break them. Nearer shore it frequently happens that ship anchors, fouling in the cables, drag them up when the anchors are weighed. In the early days of cables the fishermen who made such catches would reach down and cut the cables instead of sacrificing their anchors as they are now induced to do by promises of liberal reimbursements. At the shore ends, too, cables are subject to the constant wear and tear of heavy tides rubbing them against rocky or coral bottoms.

Brakes Quickly Found.

As soon as breaks in the cable occur, electricians, working on the coast where the cables land, make accurate calculations of the positions of the breaks and forward their results to the captains of the repair ships. The break is quickly and easily found by means of the Wheatstone bridge, a commonly used electrical device which measures the resistance offered by a conductor to a given electric current.

The ships, keeping in constant touch with the shore by radio in order to be familiar with the most recent developments, hurry out to the established position of the breaks and begin their work. The greatest care is taken to determine the positions exactly, not only because that is necessary in order to find a cable a little more than one inch in diameter that is lying two or three miles below the surface, but also because in some places, particularly between New York and Halifax, the cables are laid so near each other as to make it possible that the ship may pick up the wrong one. Then the bottom is tested with equal care to determine the kind of grapnel that should be used in dragging for the cable. These grapnels are essentially huge multi-pronged hooks. They are made according to several designs, each of which is adapted for use on a different type of bottom, for on a soft bottom the cable may be expected to be partially buried in the ooze, while it will probably be resting uncovered on a hard bottom.

This completes the preliminary work and now the actual task of finding and repairing the broken cable begins. Sailing to a position several miles from the line and at right angles to it, the grapnel that has been decided upon is dropped by a strong line from the stern of the ship until it reaches bottom. The ship steams slowly in the direction of the cable until a sudden pull on the line indicates that the grapnel has caught a heavy weight in its hooks. An instrument called a dynamometer, by measuring the strain on the grapnel line, is able to distinguish between the pull of chance obstacles on the bottom of the sea with which the grapnel may become entangled and the steady sustained weight of tons of cable. The old timers can judge fairly accurately, merely by watching the way the grapnel line straightens out and grows taut, whether the cable has been caught.

The next step varies according to the kind of grapnel that has been chosen. If it is the kind that grips the cable and cuts it at the same time, the repair ship steams a short distance toward the shore to which the end of the cable that is gripped in the grapnel is attached, stops and lifts the cut end to the surface, where it is held by a buoy. The ship then catches the other end in a grapnel, cuts away the damaged part and splices the two ends together with a new piece of cable.

If, on the other hand, the grapnel is the kind that merely lifts the cable just as it finds it, the ship stops when the dynamometer shows that the cable has been caught, the engines lift the heavy line and the electricians set to work to locate the break.

SCIENCE PICTURES A SUPERMAN OF TOMORROW

Biologists See Him a Man of Superior Intellect, Immune From Many Diseases, With a Greater Span of Life and Power to Choose the Sex of Children

IS it possible to evolve a race of supermen? What has science achieved in the way of animal transformation? These questions are discussed in the following article, which has been read and approved by Dr. Oscar Riddle of the Carnegie Institution of Washington.

By H. GORDON GARBEDIAN.

THE man of tomorrow will be able to add a few feet to his stature, will probably be endowed with a superior intellect and will enjoy immunity from many or most forms of disease. It is likely that this superior human being will add many years to the span of life usual today, and it is possible that he will have the power of bringing sons or daughters into the world according to choice.

These are the amazing possibilities visualized by some men of science today who through brilliant experiments have made the startling revelations that the form, color, size, structure, habits and sex of certain animals may be changed or reversed. Biologists have so regulated the major processes of life among the animal kingdom that by control of heredity and environmental factors they can now at will transform the salamander from a water to a land animal; double the size of rats, mice and salamanders; propagate a wingless race of fruit flies; produce families of fishes with only one eye; reverse or determine the sex of birds, frogs and some other animals, and alter the heredity and destiny of other creatures.

The biologist with his delicate tests, microscopes and innumerable charts and graphs is transforming the future. His experiments have yielded vital disclosures about life processes which are destroying the theory that an ancient war exists between heredity and environment, and showing that all plants and animals are the result of heredity and environment closely interacting.

Control of Development.

Some biologists assert that though the nature and destiny of organisms can be changed either by a change in the heredity factors or genes or by suitable radical changes in the conditions of environment, the greatest hope for controlling the characteristics of man now lies in the control of specific conditions during development and growth. The problem is to find suitable means of applying to man those agencies which have proved, and will later prove, effective in the animal world.

All living matter is plastic and will yield to exact knowledge of specific directing agencies, these biologists now conclude. Human progress need no longer be left largely to chance. Man of tomorrow will be a sculptor with the power not only of fashioning the race but of controlling its destiny and purpose in life.

This "superman" of the tomorrow which is seen appearing on the horizon will owe much of his capacity for physical giantism to a hormone or internal secretion to be found in the pituitary gland, we are told. It is often the state of our glands, as most of us know, that dictates whether we shall be circus sideshow freaks or ordinary human beings of usual height, whether we shall convert our food properly into energy or not, whether we shall be active or sluggish, and whether we shall be leaders or followers, socially minded citizens or criminals.

In some isolated cases the hormone of the thyroid gland, which is also necessary to normal growth, has been applied by medical men on dwarfs and other sub-normal human beings who thus have already gained some increase of stature. The growth hormone of the pituitary gland is not now obtainable except in a crude form, quite unsuitable for human use, but this crude product has been used on some animals with marked results. Earnest efforts are now under way, in some laboratories in different parts of the world, to isolate this hormone in a pure condition for human use.

Isolation of the Hormone.

"This hormone may be isolated in usable form within a year, ten years or the next twenty years," Dr. Oscar Riddle, past president of the Association for the Study of Internal Secretions and member of the staff of the Carnegie Institution of Washington, replied to the question as to when science expects to produce a pure or usable product from which such important results are expected.

"When the pure hormone is obtainable, it unquestionably and immediately will be used to increase the growth or stunted or dwarfed human beings. A long series of injections during the period of growth will probably be necessary. Whether any one having our so-called normal stature will ever wish further to increase his size is a thing I do not know.

"The medical profession will no doubt use it first of all to bless the diminutive among us, but there is valid reason to expect that with this gift the physician, or perhaps the experimentalist, will also have the power to add a cubit or two to the stature of the offspring of all of us. It is the effect that demonstrations of this power will have on the thought and purpose of the bystander that I consider of great importance."

Charles Dickens once reflected that "life is one dem'd horrid grind." But this superman of the future will have little cause for such bemoanings. For along with a selected desirable height, the results of experimental science and medicine seem capable of giving him other "supernormal and beneficent developments" which will enable him largely to rid childhood of disease, and to free the adult from the chains of many physical and even of mental deformities.

The rate of progress of those who are directly studying immunization and the prevention of disease largely justifies this prediction. But a control of the development of the body and of its various parts will probably further assist the fight against the very factors which breed disease.

The man and woman who is free from the fear of disease and enjoys a more perfect health at all time, will not he or she make greater strides in the conquests of nature and in adding to the store of human genius?

Researches into the ductless glands made by Dr. Abel of Johns Hopkins University and Dr. Riddle and many other scientists point to the conclusion that the human body structure and activity and even our intellectual status and mental activities are partly dependent upon the manner in which our ductless glands function. With the greater knowledge of these glands and with their control, the man of the future, already largely freed from the handicaps placed by disease on his intellectual activities should be able to make even greater strides forward in the direction of a superior intellect.

A Higher Intelligence.

"A higher order of intelligence in future man is not predictable from any fact of experimental science known to me; but the mind of man is so tied with his physical structure that it is difficult to consider them completely separable," Dr. Riddle said. "Once man is able to exercise control over his physical development, it seems to me unlikely that the tantalizing matter of mental development will escape the influence of the experimenter. Investigators will undoubtedly seek, and eventually they will probably both find and at least partially control, those factors or agencies which make one man a Presidential possibility, another a great money maker, another a great author and still another simply a day laborer."

These astonishing predictions, we are told, are the probabilities based on the great advances of biological knowledge acquired in a short period of half a century. Their realization depends on the measure of control gained in special modifications of the environment, including the future utilization of the full regulating powers of the ductless glands, the new concept of heredity and the sure advances of many special branches of medicine.

What vast vistas of human progress will be thrown open if science some day wins control of the chromosome, the citadel of life and partner in all development within the cells that form our body structure?

The chromosomes of the cell are microscopically visible rods or granules consisting of still smaller bodies called genes. These genes are constantly bustling with the business of life and are central actors in the great drama of life, heredity and evolution. It is the different combinations of genes which ordinarily determine that a prospective human being is to have blue eyes, or that he is to be a brunette, a male or a female or that he is to be gifted with a musician's sensitiveness of ear. It is now known that the difference between a Beethoven and an imbecile is often a difference in the accidental combination of one or a few sets of genes.

If the relationship of the genes within the cell is changed and no counteracting change occurs in the environment, variations appear in the offspring that are not possessed by the parents. The results may be an unexpected change in hair or eye color, in size, sex or intellectual capacity.

"Man of Tomorrow Will Be a Sculptor With the Power Not Only of Fashioning the Race, but of Controlling Its Destiny and Purpose in Life."

Take, for example, the fruit fly, Drosophila. It takes perhaps fifty combinations of pairs of genes to produce its red eye. Alter only one of these genes, so that all fifty on one side are what they should be and only forty-nine on the opposite side are normal, and the fruit flies that are the offspring will have not red eyes but possibly colorless eyes. Thus, one wrong gene may affect a single characteristic. And there are fifty pairs of genes—fifty ways in which one trait of comparatively little importance, such as the pigmentation of the eye, can be changed.

Any pair of human parents may thus produce not merely thousands but millions of different combinations of genes, each yielding a child of different characteristics. That fact allows us to understand why some cases of genius such as Lincoln's or Shakespeare's may spring from apparently ordinary ancestry and why such great men as Napoleon or Goethe do not always have great sons.

If we could control the interaction of these genes inside the chromosome by introducing purpose where now there is only chance, there is strong evidence for the belief that we could produce not only supermen but could determine that these supermen should be unparalleled mathematicians or artists, engineers or industrial leaders. What prospect is there of science ever gaining this power of juggling genes at will—an accomplishment which would go so far in solving the momentous riddle of life?

There are now two hopeful roads, according to J. B. S. Haldane, the English scientist, which biologists may travel toward the goal of finding a method which will alter a single gene without interfering with the others. By pursuing the first they must find a chemical substance which will attack one gene and not another. The scientific traveler on the second road must answer the question he will find at every crossroads: How can I focus ultra-violet rays on a fraction of a chromosome without injuring the human cell?

"We know today of no combinations of genes which are to enter into a human being or into the human race of tomorrow," explained Dr. Riddle. "But the road to developmental changes in human beings through changes and controls of one or another of the multitude of specific environmental conditions is, nevertheless, open and is daily becoming more widely opened. It should therefore prove possible to provide future men with unusual and beneficent developments.

"To produce these changes in an individual and in a race it will, of course, be necessary to bring about changes in specific conditions during various stages of life and development. Most of these special conditions will doubtless have to be applied during very early life. This will mean, indeed, a sort of supermedicine, a supereducation and a continuous and a very personal application of a great body of knowledge."

Let us now see what biologists have accomplished in bringing about changes in these "special conditions" among animals and how far they have gone in controlling the size, sex and other structures and functions of animals. It is partly on such experiments that science must depend for the accumulation of data from which to evolve formulae that may be applied to the betterment of the human race.

Determination of Sex.

At the Station for Experimental Evolution of Carnegie Institution of Washington at Cold Spring Harbor, L. I. Dr. Riddle has been able to override the influence of chromosomal differences and has brought about vital structural changes, including sex control or reversal. By crossing very unlike species of pigeons and doves he has obtained male offspring only, regardless of whether the eggs used are of one chromosomal type or the other. This would not be a very practical way of controlling sex in the human being since mates so dissimilar would have to be sought among the gorillas and chimpanzees. Dr. Riddle further found that by overworking the reproductive activities of doves by taking away the eggs as soon as laid and causing the birds to lay many more than the usual number there will be reproduction of an excess of females.

In the frog, German biologists have found that eggs and embryos which would otherwise produce females can be made to develop into male tadpoles and frogs by exposing them to temperatures higher than normal during early development or by causing the frog eggs to become "overripe" before allowing the sperms to unite with them.

Several European and American experimentalists have also found that the complete reversal of sex in animals may be obtained by a simple surgical operation. A normal young female fowl thus treated becomes a rooster.

The example may be cited here of the case of a young woman under the observation of Dr. John A. Abel of Johns Hopkins University whose sex characteristics of a woman were changed to those of a man by excess secretions of ductless glands caused by a tumor. Dr. Abel points out that all her secondary feminine characteristics, physical and psychological, were of the opposite sex. Her normal sex characteristics were restored by an operation on the tumor.

In experiments with the fruit fly, which is provided with a chromosome mechanism which usually causes the formation of extra legs, it was learned at Columbia University that if the eggs and young are merely grown at a high temperature instead of at the usual lower temperature, they do not form the extra legs.

Consider, next, the amazing versatility of a certain salamander. In its native locality this animal lives in the water, breathes by means of gills, and throughout its entire life has the other characteristics of a water animal. If, however, it is transplanted to certain other regions or is forced during a particular period of its development to spend a part of the time in the air, or is fed some thyroid tissue, it then becomes a land animal. It loses its gills, develops lungs and becomes an altogether different individual.

Give the salamander a diet made up of the anterior lobe of the pituitary gland and we have what Dr. Riddle considers an example of how large stature, or giantism, can be made to form from the same hereditary factors which form an animal of normal size. For the animal becomes, as shown by Dr. Uhlenhuth, about twice as large as when it feeds on its normal diet of earthworms! The same result has been obtained on rats injected with a pituitary extract.

Again, the scientific experimenter can now decide whether certain fishes are to develop two eyes or only a single one. Two eyes form under usual conditions; but single-eyed individuals can be obtained merely by adding a depressant, such as various anesthetics or a magnesium salt, to the water in which the eggs develop.

Even more decisive changes are accomplished. Men can now step in at a certain stage in the development of a worm-like creature and by changing the animal's environment decide which of the ends of the organism should be head and which tail. In the matter of color, experimenters are no less successful. White fowls, or treated parts of their plumage, under their magic touch become black. Black moths are produced in laboratories and propagate descendants equally black.

What application to human beings can the control of sex among animals, which science has already achieved, have? Dr. Riddle, after reviewing his own work and that of other scientists in wresting from nature its innermost secrets touching on this point, replied:

Application to Humans.

"That theoretically sex control everywhere is possible has been demonstrated. Only practical difficulties bar the way to control of sex in human beings. The present methods used to control sex are largely inapplicable to the human. But if, as some of us think, the ultimate effect of these several methods is reducible to changes in metabolism, or the rate at which oxidation takes place in the developing embryo, we can hope later to employ in man new agencies which will act on the metabolic rate in the egg and embryo.

"In the human species a relatively simple mechanism for control of sex has been available ever since we learned that in mammals, including man, there are two kinds of sperm cells—one kind with male-producing and the other with female-producing chromosomes. Since they are different, it is open to the experimentalist to find a selective method by which to kill or to inactivate one kind of sperm at will without injuring the other type and thus control the appearance of individuals of one sex. The fact that no one has succeeded in doing this does not mean that it is not within the province of science to accomplish it in the future."

From the dawn of history, when the primitive man strolled from his cave, club in hand, to slay the living that by so doing he might live, mankind has dreamed of achieving the superman. The demigod of the Greeks who rode in a flaming chariot and ruled the elements; Don Quixote, Milton's Satan, Achilles, Sir Galahad, Hercules, Robin Hood and the innumerable dauntless figures in literature are ample evidence of that.

A Superior Race in View.

Now science provokes serious thought by envisioning real probabilities of a superior race of human beings who in some respects may fulfill the dreams of fanciful writers. Will the man of tomorrow, endowed with the control of size, structure, characteristics and capacities that science is seeking, force evolution into new channels, establish a new mode of living and ordain a new, radical course for human development? In his prospective world, will this man with self-added powers transform civilization, march to new triumphs over nature and redefine the ultimate purpose and destiny of human life?

"So great may be the change in the physical and intellectual life of man a century hence that it is very hazardous for any person now living to try and draw a good picture of it," Dr. Riddle replied. "Probably the supreme result of the application of the power of developmental control among men would rest on the transformation it can bring to the mental outlook of man. That transformed outlook would be more important to the human race than even a release from pain or disease, greater physical and mental strength, the greater length of life or the more desirable type or degree of the multitudes of characteristics which a successful application of the new knowledge of the control of human development would give them.

"Ignorance may never disappear. But myth and superstition will not commonly survive a wide application of that kind of knowledge which controls and transforms human capacities. When on man himself is exercised the power which has already been used on animals, the mind of man will not only grow, it will find freedom."

OLD BILLINGSGATE TO BE DOUBLED IN SIZE

London's Historic Fish Market Will Be Made Over at a Cost of $7,500,000

By HAYDEN CHURCH.

LONDON.

BILLINGSGATE Market, the place whose name has given "billingsgate" to the language, probably the biggest and certainly the most famous fish mart in the world, is to be enlarged. The Corporation of the City of London, which owns it, has decided to double its present size, and will spend $7,500,000 in doing so.

Work will begin next year, and among other things, it is planned by street widening to ease a traffic congestion that costs, in wasted time, more than $150,000 a year and that has been a Billingsgate problem for upward of five centuries.

This oldest and most renowned of British markets is situated on the Thames waterfront, between London Bridge and the Tower of London. In Billingsgate fish to the amount of more than 240,000 tons, valued at more than $28,000,000, are sold every year; something like 15,000,000 Britons depend on the market for their supplies. In catching and handling the fish landed in Great Britain, about a fifth of which comes to Billingsgate, more than 250,000 men and boys are engaged, and in connection with the market some 6,000 persons are employed.

In the old days of Billingsgate people who objected to cursing did well to give a wide berth to the market and its hinterland, where profanity had been reduced to a fine art. But other times, other manners! Today the people of the market do not seem to indulge in any more strong language than do people in any other walk of life. A mission hall opened in the market some years ago is agreed to have exerted an ennobling influence. When the writer visited the market recently, he didn't hear one sizable oath.

On the contrary, he beheld Billingsgate fish porters, who used to be famous for making the air around them blue with profanity, reverently decorating with fish the near-by church of St. Dunstan-in-the-East (which is situated paradoxically in Idol Lane), and was told that they do this every year in celebration of the fish and fowl Harvest Festival, using fish, just as, in the country, villagers use vegetables and fruit of all kinds in decorating churches in thanks for the harvest.

Not only do the Billingsgate workers of today use comparatively little bad language, they resent the prevalent belief that they are still a hard-swearing crowd. When David Lloyd George, in his more obstreperous days, attacked the Tories in a series of violent speeches, his denunciations were characterized by the Conservative press as "billingsgate." This description the toilers of Billingsgate considered unfair to the market.

Primitive Methods.

Billingsgate Market is practically the only one in the country which has not been reorganized to meet modern requirements, and one sees evidences of this on all sides. Up from the wharves to the market runs a steep gangway, and up and down this like ants tramp endless lines of porters carrying fish-crates on their heads. There is not a mechanical contrivance of any kind for handling the fish. When a man's neck "sets" as they call it, he can carry as much as 220 pounds weight on his head. They do it every day and all day. The Genoese galleys which, in the middle ages, anchored near by were unloaded in exactly the same way. So were Pharaoh's galleys and Caesar's.

The American visitor hears mysterious references to "bommarees." The middle-men of Billingsgate are known as "bommarees." Why, nobody is able to explain, least of all the "bommarees" themselves, except that they always have been so called. Early in the game, too, the visitor is impressed by the queer hats that the fish-porters wear. Looking rather like stunted Burmese pagodas, these hats are made entirely of leather and weigh a bit more than seven pounds.

They are made flat to enable the porters to carry heavy weights on their heads. There are only two makers of these hats, which are believed to be exclusive to London. The porters like to keep the same hat as long as they can, having them mended when parts wear out, and some men have made one hat last as long as thirty years. Inside the hats the porters wear the crowns of old felt hats. The remainder of their official costume consists of a long garment somewhat resembling an old-fashioned nightshirt, which is known as a "smock." The smocks that the Billingsgate porters wear were white once. Now they bear the stains of nearly fifty-seven varieties of fish.

Billingsgate, London's Famous Fish Market.

This writer wandered between long lines of dead fish. Nothing on earth can look so dead as a fish. It is difficult to believe in a lavish place of this kind that fish have ever lived, have ever sported gallantly in the sea, making romantic love and building homes and generally seeing to it that we shall go on having fish after soup.

One Night's Fish.

All the fruit of the sea, mixed up with ice, comes to Billingsgate—more than 600 tons of fish came by train during a single night from places like Grimsby and far Scottish seacoast towns like Thurso and Wick, and some 200 tons more in steamers known as "fish-carriers" that ply, in all weathers and all seasons, between Billingsgate and the fishing fleet on the Dogger Bank. Still other loads come from Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Belgium and Holland. The Dutch eels sold in Billingsgate are brought in boats that, ever since Queen Elizabeth's time, have enjoyed the right of mooring here.

At 5 o'clock in the morning, between the baskets of fish, walk men and women—fish-sellers, hotel-buyers and the like—prodding, examining, comparing, now and then tasting a shrimp, sometimes cracking an experimental mussel. Around the auctioneers surge excited crowds of buyers. Here and there in the crowd are the inspectors, "fish-meters" as they are still called, of the Worshipful Company of Fishmongers, who have authority to condemn out of hand any fish that is not fit for Londoners to eat. There are vast piles of boxes and barrels—fish everywhere. By 9 A. M., the selling for the day is over.

Billingsgate is literally England's oldest market. At this spot London's first imports were landed, and London's first merchants gathered. How Billingsgate got its queer name is not known definitely. According to one early chronicler an ancient water "gate" to London that once existed here was named for Belin, King of the Britons, who reigned more than 400 years before Christ, and thus the locality became known as "Belin's gate." On the other hand, Stowe, the London historian, thinks that the site of the market was once owned by a man named Billings.

Certain it is, however, that fish were sold on this spot even in Saxon times, for in A. D. 979, King Ethelred made a law granting special privileges to men from the French town of Rouen who brought "wine and large fysh" to "Bilynggesgate."

In 1699, Billingsgate was officially constituted an "open market," which meant that anybody could buy there, on six days in the week, but mackerel was allowed to be sold after church on Sunday mornings on the ground that this fish was good for eating only a short time after being caught.

From quite an early date in its history Billingsgate seems to have been associated with bad language, but perhaps the market people got the discredit for the profanity of others as well as for their own.

FINDING OF IDOL RENEWS SEARCH FOR INCAS' GOLD

Prospectors' Discovery in an Ecuador Cave Revives Quest Four Centuries Old for Fabulous Treasure That Eluded Pizarro and His Adventurers

JUST as New York, with memories of Blackbeard and Captain Kidd, now and again revives the vision of a possible unearthing of pirate hoards in the neighborhood, so Peru still dreams of some day retrieving a successfully secreted Inca treasure. The recent discovery by prospectors near the Pass of Aujuay, in Ecuador, of a cave containing an Inca idol and a number of skeletons has led to the hope that the long lost treasure lies near by.

The hope is bolstered by circumstantial evidence of the existence of such a treasure trove. Years ago a poor Spaniard named Valverde suddenly appeared, possessed of such vast wealth that no one could imagine anything except that he had found a hidden treasure. Tradition had long held that somewhere in the fastnesses of the mountains was a cave full of rich jewels and precious metals which the Incas had stored away. Rumor had it that Valverde had come upon it. He admitted it, and his dying bequest to the King of Spain was the secret of the cave's location.

Generations of adventurers since then have applied themselves to the quest, goaded on by the glamour of buried wealth. But at the mountain called Margasitas the trail was always lost. That far the features of the landscape coincided unmistakably with Valverde's description, according to the English botanist, Richard Spruce, who undertook the quest in 1857; but further than that all were at a loss what course to pursue.

Wealth Undreamed Of.

The Inca wealth at the time of the arrival in Peru of Francis Pizarro and his men was almost incredible to Europeans. Here at last the dream of riches unbounded, which had lured Spain into the unknown on the path of discovery, appeared fully realized. No sooner had the white man landed than natives of the coast began to relate to them accounts of the powerful monarch who ruled the land and of his resplendent capital in a valley of the mountains—the city of the Sun, blazing with gold and silver.

The Inca governed his people with a despotic hand. All that they were and did was according to law and order. They knew no poverty, no want; but for this security was exacted unending industry. In labor they paid their taxes; and enormous were the public works that resulted—astounding the riches amassed for palace and temple.

The eyes of Pizarro's men glistened when they beheld the envoys of Atahualpa, the Inca, approach, quaffing their native chicha from golden goblets. When finally the Spaniards reached Atahualpa's luxurious camp at Caxamalca, they were themselves served from enormous golden vessels. The Inca received the strangers with friendliness and lodged them in the deserted town near by, assuring them that he would visit them on the following day.

Moving toward the town with all his army in battle array, the Inca halted on the plain, sending word that with an unarmed retinue he would enter the town to pass the night as the Spaniard's guests. He came borne on a throne of massive gold, shaded by a palanquin lined with the plumes of tropical birds and studded with plates of silver and gold. Around his neck was a collar of brilliant emeralds and in his short hair were ornaments of gold. It was the visit of one sovereign to the representative of another.

A Treacherous Capture.

But the Spaniards, meantime, had laid a plot. They would capture the Child of the Sun there amid his armies and so gain the key to the conquest of Peru. This scheme they boldly accomplished by a massacre of Atahualpa's defenseless attendants. Then they pursued his terror-stricken armies beyond his encampment and brought back with them vessels and table plate of great size and weight and many fine emeralds.

But this was nothing to what the conquerors were presently to see. Atahualpa, perceiving their greed for gold, schemed to turn it to the purchase of his freedom. Prescott, in his monumental history of the conquest of Peru, has set forth the story in detail.

The captive Inca one day proposed to Pizarro that he would cover the floor of the apartment in which they stood with gold in return for his release from captivity. The Spanish nobles gazed at him incredulously, whereupon he insisted that he would fill the room as high as he could reach. At first they took his offers for no more than insane boasting. Then Pizarro, concluding there must be some foundation for the dazzling accounts he had heard, and conceiving that this would be a safe method of collecting all the wealth at the Inca's disposal easily and without risk of its being purloined or secreted by the natives, agreed to accede to Atahualpa's proposal.

On the wall of the chamber, which measured seventeen feet by twenty-two, a red line was drawn nine feet from the floor, to indicate how high the treasure pile should reach; and a notary was called to record the contract. The ransom was to be assembled in two months, the captive monarch promised; and for good measure a smaller adjoining room was to be twice filled with silver. Couriers were sent to Cuzco, the capital, and other cities of the empire with orders from the idolized monarch and with instructions that neither temple nor public building was to be spared to make good his part of the agreement.

In time Indian porters began to appear at the gates of Caxamalca laden with burdens of enormous value. Some of the articles weighed as much as twenty-five pounds. On some days the treasure registered and placed under guard was worth many thousands of dollars. When the Spaniards complained that the Indian porters did not work fast enough, the Inca permitted some of his captors to go to his capital to take what they liked; and from Cuzco they brought 200 loads of gold. Seven hundred plates of gold, "the size of a chest lid," and from ten to twelve inches wide, were stripped from the walls of the Temple of the Sun, but the cornice of pure gold was too firmly imbedded in the masonry to be removed.

As the gold poured in the Spaniards, each eager for his share, could not wait for the room to be filled; and so Pizarro had a document drawn up publicly and proclaimed acquitting Atahualpa of completing the store. Then he applied himself to the division of the treasure. There were goblets, ewers, salvers, vases, ornaments and utensils, tiles and plates of solid gold; figures of animals and forms of plants. Especially admired was an ear of golden corn in a sheath of silver husks with a tassel of spun silver, and with a fountain having a jet of gold and golden animals and birds playing at its base. The most beautiful of the pieces were reserved intact as part of the royal fifth; the rest was melted down by Indian goldsmiths and parceled out to the soldiers and their leaders.

No one in all history ever paid such a ransom. Its value amounted to more than $15,000,000, but little did it avail the ill-fated Inca. The Spaniards dared not set at liberty the person possessed of the force and influence to unite the Peruvians for resistance; neither did they dare to run the risk of transporting him with them as a prisoner. His execution was demanded. A mock trial was held; a long list of absurd charges was brought; and the prisoner, found guilty, was sentenced to be burned at the stake on the same day. Upon his acceptance of the Christian faith his sentence was modified to death by strangulation. Aug. 29, 1533, saw the end of the last of the Incas.

The conquerors continued their quest of riches, seizing and looting Cuzco. But after the death of the Inca, fabulous treasures destined for the ransom were concealed in caves and other secret places. One of these found by Pizarro's men yielded many treasures, including a dozen life-size figures in precious metals. And now the discovery of an Inca idol and some skeletons has started anew the quest four centuries old.

AMBASSADOR EDGE PRESENTS CHECK FOR BOY SCOUT CAMP

Fund of $15,000 Made Available for Purchase of Site for the Atlantic City Troops

AS a tribute to the value of the Boy Scout movement in character building and citizenship training Walter E. Edge, formerly United States Senator from New Jersey, who sailed Friday to assume his new duties as Ambassador to France, has presented a check for $15,000 to be used in the purchase of a new camp site for the Boy Scouts of Atlantic County, N. J. The gift was made at a farewell party given for Ambassador Edge at his home in the Ventnor section of Atlantic City by 225 Boy Scouts, five from each of the forty-five Scout troops in Atlantic County. Senator Edge was a founder of the Atlantic City Council and its first president from 1914 to 1918.

The representative of Atlantic City troops, led by a band and a bugle corps, assembled on the lawn of the Edge estate and staged a series of the Scout activities in which the Ambassador was especially interested. Twenty-five of the Scouts wore the uniform of the Boy Scouts of France and carried French Scout flags. After this demonstration of Scouting activities Ambassador Edge held a reception for the Scouts, telling them of his interest in the movement. The check was presented through C. M. Koury, president of the Atlantic City Council.

The Boy Scouts of Atlantic City are known to thousands of convention visitors from all parts of the United States because of their service at many conventions. The Scouts serve as messengers and ushers at conventions held in Atlantic City's great convention hall on the Boardwalk.

CHESTNUT TREE NEARLY EXTINCT

WILL the American chestnut tree be only a name to the grandchildren of this generation? Experts believe so. Chestnuts, so long abundant in the mountains of Eastern Tennessee and Western North Carolina, are scarce this season. Once so plentiful and cheap, they have greatly increased in price. In a few years, experts say, there will be no American chestnuts, as the blight that fastened its deadly poison on it cannot be checked and the species is doomed.

In view of the situation, experiments with foreign chestnuts are now being made. While closely related to the American trees, the foreign species are different and their fruit is different.

OUR NATIONAL BOOK CENSOR FINDS HIS WORK IS GROWING

Customs Officer in Washington Has Many Cases Arising Under Ban on Obscenity

WASHINGTON.

AN increase in importations of books that come within the provisions of section 305 of the 1922 tariff act, which denies entry into the United States of obscene books from any foreign country, has added materially to the work of the "book censor" of the Treasury Department—who is J. D. Nevius, deputy commissioner of customs. Though collectors of customs in some 250 cities of the United States are responsible for 90 per cent of the seizures, in cases of doubt the books are referred to Washington.

An employe of the Treasury for some thirty years, Mr. Nevius started as a clerk. Studying law, he was later assigned to the legal division of the bureau, and now has charge of it. Censorship of books is only one of his duties, but it raises many questions that call for complex decisions.

Books may be referred to Washington either by a customs collector who wishes to have a higher authority pass upon the legality of their importation, or by an importer whose books have been seized and who hopes that the decision on them will be reversed. Barely a week passes that two or three books do not come to be examined, and some weeks bring considerably more. Once, in a period of three months, 106 titles were seized. Reports from customs officers throughout the country show that seizures have been increasing in numbers, especially since the war.

The censorship is by no means a one-man job. The books first of all are read and examined by one of Mr. Nevius's principal assistants, J. B. Corridon. Mr. Corridon is also a lawyer, who for several years has made a special study of the laws and legal decisions covering book imports. Not infrequently differences of opinion arise which are not settled until the book has been referred to Captain Eble, commissioner of customs, and Seymour Lowman, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury. Occasionally the difference of opinion will be so marked that a book will be taken to Ogden Mills, Undersecretary of the Treasury.

Importers have other means of redress against the seizure of books. They may appeal either to the customs court or to the Federal courts. A number of appeals of this sort are now pending, and recently the court has overruled the bureau of the customs, which barred "The Well of Loneliness," by Miss Radclyffe Hall.

Congress has had a ban on the admission of obscene literature since 1842. In carrying out the mandate of Congress the Treasury Department has not tried to work out rules of censorship of its own. It has merely sought to exclude books that fall within the scope of the statute. In this it has been helped by numerous court decisions. In fact, a body of law has been developed in this field that enables officials of the customs bureau, in nine cases out of ten, to reach a quick decision. Customs officials, of course, have no authority over books published in the United States nor over the interstate transportation of books of this kind.

The Bureau of Customs' list of books that are to be denied entry now contains several hundred items. It includes a number of classics in their unexpurgated editions. Among these are The Decameron of Boccaccio, the works of Rabelais, and Balzac's Droll Stories. Many books on the index expurgatorious are written in French or Spanish.

If a book imported appears on the official list, collectors at the ports seize it without referring it to Washington, although the importer may appeal over their heads, if he chooses, or carry his case to the courts.

Mr. Corridon keeps under lock and key copies of many of the volumes seized. These may be useful later for purpose of comparison. The customs officials often deny entrance to a particular edition of a work, though other editions may be readily admitted because of the expurgation of a few passages.

Senator Cutting of New Mexico introduced an amendment to lift the ban on the importation of objectionable books, which would relieve the Bureau of Customs from the duty of censoring.

DIVORCE IN RUSSIA NO LONGER IS FREE

THE time of State functionaries in Soviet Russia is being taken up with the business of issuing decrees of divorce to such an extent that the authorities there have at last determined to do something toward making the "beneficiaries" of the liberal laws on separation pay for the accommodation.

According to a report from Moscow found in a local Russian newspaper, the Council of People's Commissars has decreed that in the future divorce papers are to cost from 25 cents to $2. Up to now they have been free.

The eighteenth annual appeal for the Hundred Neediest Cases is made today.

AVIATION GAINS LAUDED BY ADVISORY COMMITTEE

Air Mail Still Called Backbone of Transport—Greater Safety And Lower Costs Set as Goals—Europe Ahead In Both Big Planes and Speed

By LAUREN D. LYMAN.

THE fifteenth annual report of the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics for the year 1929, which President Hoover submitted to Congress on Dec. 5, contains many items of general interest, and among them one which appears to present an opinion of these experts very much at variance with that of the Postmaster General in regard to what the government's policy should be toward the air mail.

President Hoover, in presenting the report, stressed especially references to the position of the United States in aeronautics relative to that of other nations. We lead the world, the report holds, in the use of the plane for commercial purposes; in the private ownership and operation of planes; in the extent and lighting of airways; in the provision of weather report service; in the number of airports and intermediate landing fields; in the development of radio communication and directional finding facilities; in the transport of mail by air; in crop dusting and forest patrol by air; in aerial photography and mapping; in the development of cowling for air-cooled engines and engine starters; in the development of catapult launching and deck arresting devices, and in the development of parachutes.

Other Points of Merit.

In addition to this impressive list here are some more items in which, according to the committee, we are abreast of the rest of the world: In the development of military types of airplanes; in the airship development program; in the use of metal construction, and in the development of air-cooled and fuel-injected engines.

In connection, however, with military development the following paragraph from a summary of the report offers an apparent contradiction:

"America is definitely behind other nations in the development of seaplane floats and in the development and use of seaplanes, water-cooled engines, and large air transports, and also in the development of air passenger traffic. America holds the world's altitude record, but is far behind in maximum speed."

Postmaster for Reduction.

Postmaster General Brown, in one of his earlier pronouncements regarding the air mail, stated that the pioneering period in aviation was coming to its close. He said further that, while neither he nor others in posts of authority were disposed to deprive the mail lines of necessary return, it was his opinion that rates should be revised downward.

For the purpose of arriving at rates which would save the government several millions of dollars a year he called upon the contractors to get together and agree upon a formula that would meet the department's approval and satisfy them. The contractors met and met again in Washington. They returned to their companies and reported. Once more they met. The result was simply definite proof that they could not agree.

The contractors have come away from some of the conferences with a distinct feeling that the Postoffice Department maintains its attitude that the days of experiment and pioneering are about over, in spite of the extensive experiments in radio and aircraft development being carried on all over the country, either by companies affiliated directly with mail lines or companies which make a large part of their income by supplying those lines with equipment.

Some of the operators obtained the impression from the Postmaster General that it was his opinion that the air mail should be carried on lines established for freight, passenger and express service. In other words, that the principle established by Postmaster General New which tempted big business to enter the air mail field—namely, that the air mail for many years to come would be the back log for commercial air transport, would pay the bills in return for the fastest mail service in the world—was to be abandoned.

Mr. Brown has departed some distance, at any rate, from the stand that the airlines cannot exist at present and still maintain important experimental departments without liberal air mail contracts.

Committee Stresses Mails.

"Foremost among the factors that have promoted the use of aircraft was the development and extension of the air mail service under government operation until its fundamental purpose had been demonstrated, namely, that it was practicable to carry mails by aircraft on regular schedule and at reasonable cost," the N. A. C. A. report says and adds:

"The most recent major factor promoting the use of aircraft in America has been the development of reliable air transport, largely assisted by air mail contracts, which have been the main support of most long-distance air transport companies. The air mail service, under private operation of carriers, continues to give the best demonstration of the practicability of the use of aircraft for civil purposes.

"At the annual meeting of the entire committee, held on Oct. 24, 1929, a resolution was adopted reiterating the opinion expressed in 1921 in a special report to the Congress, submitted through the President. * * * The committee is still of the opinion, as then expressed, that 'the air mail service is in effect an experimental laboratory for the development of the civil uses of aircraft,' and, viewing it from this angle alone, believes that it is worth what it costs over and above the difference between the revenue derived from the excess postage and the cost of carrying, if any."

The committee discusses briefly the most important economic question, except possibly the air mail contracts, with which airline operators are faced, namely: Are the people willing in increasing numbers to pay the present costs of air travel?

"We think not," answers the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics and then tells why:

"Costs must be reduced to a competitive basis where, after making allowance for time saved and for the inherent attractiveness of air travel, the costs will be fairly comparable with other means of transportation. We believe that can be done, but not by governmental regulation of rates and services.

"It is easy to see that reduction in unit costs can be accomplished by increase in volume, but volume cannot be satisfactorily increased with costs as they are."

The answer then, according to the committee, is to improve the airplane, "make it lighter and stronger; make it faster and more controllable; make it carry more pay load and consume less fuel and oil; construct it more simply and cheaply and make it easier to maintain and overhaul; make it more reliable by improving methods and facilities of air navigation; improve the landing and take-off characteristics of the airplane so as to enable it to land and take off in small areas—in short, improve its aerodynamic efficiency and make it more controllable, especially at low speeds."

Already airlines, notably Western Air Express and the Colonial System, are reducing fares materially. With the development of the big thirty-passenger land planes and even larger seaplanes such as Dr. Dornier is to build in this country the passenger mile overhead is bound to come down.

"CONTACT"

By REGINALD M. CLEVELAND.

IT must indeed be a sluggish pulse which has not been stirred by the unfolding drama of the successful flight of the Floyd Bennett to the South Pole and back to Little America, bearing its gallant company—Byrd, Balchen, June and McKinley—safely through the newest and in some respects the most thrilling of the heroic sagas from the waste places back of beyond. Underlying the courage, the resourcefulness, the will to win which illuminate Commander Byrd's story of the historic flight is a message of brimming good cheer for American aviation.

Designed and fabricated in that plant which stands for so much that is typical of American manufacturing, the Ford organization, and powered with Wright motors of native design and construction which once more carried American wings to new heights of achievement, the Floyd Bennett proved to the hilt that, under most difficult conditions of air and terrain, the products of aviation in the United States were able to triumph.

It was touch and go there in the shifting air currents in the pass over the Axel Heiberg Glacier, with the plane near the limit of its ceiling and a zero wind coming gustily from ice-armored rock walls. It was so rough that the heavy camera was well-nigh unmanageable. There was no room to turn; no spot to set the big ship down. Unwavering airworthiness, unfaltering motor performance must buttress flying skill of the highest order. Both were present in full measure.

IT is an encouraging picture of aviation in this country which the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics paints in its annual report, summarized more fully elsewhere on this page. The committee, whose personnel makes its observations worthy of the closest attention, finds "the temporary overexpansion in certain phases of the aircraft industry is but characteristic of new and promising American industries.

THE value of lighter-than-air craft to air travel of the future is stressed by the committee. "If the United States is to take full advantage of the possibilities of air transportation," it points out, "the importance of the development of rigid airships cannot be overemphasized, as in transportation by air over long distances, and especially over the water, rigid airships have marked advantages over airplanes. In order to develop their naval uses and in order more especially to assist and hasten the development of rigid airships in America for commercial purposes, the committee recommends firm support by the President and by the Congress of the present navy rigid airship development program."

AT least two pronouncements of the past week by President Hoover are being studied with interest and attention by men active in the industry of aviation and airline operators. They see encouragement in his letter of submittal of the N. A. C. A. report.

On the other hand, some see confirmation of their fears of drastic reduction in rates to air mail contractors in the paragraph in the President's annual message to Congress which reads:

"A revision of air mail rates upon a more systematic and permanent footing is necessary. The subject is under study, and if legislation should prove necessary the subject will be presented to the Congress."

THE industry is disturbed also over the recurring suggestion that airline operation be placed under the control of some body similar to the Interstate Commerce Commission. Its leaders feel strongly that the time is not yet—if it should ever arise—when air transport requires or would benefit from such supervision. They point out that the period of pioneering and of growth is still in full swing and that the industry should be deemed worthy and able, from its past record, which is reflected so glowingly, for example, in the N. A. C. A. report discussed above, to continue to paddle its own canoe.

Certainly the general cutting of airway fares and the expansion of many services which have marked the last few weeks are indications that the operators have every desire to deal fairly with the public. As the current issue of Aviation so aptly puts it, passenger airlines are endeavoring to make the transformation from the retail to the wholesale basis. This process involves a very important expenditure of capital during the necessary period in which time and habit must work to bring a larger proportion of our citizens to the regular use of the airways.

PERSIANS USING AIR FOR SAFETY, AVOIDING BANDITS ALONG ROADS

SAFETY first is the motto of modern Persians when traveling. Consequently, according to an account of the operations of the Junkers Company in Persia, printed in a recent issue of the Frankfurter Zeitung, when it comes to making a trip from Teheran to Bagdad in Iraq, or to Baku, the Russian oil city on the Caspian Sea, the Persian who can afford it travels by airplane in preference to automobile or camel.

As the number of passengers is limited and the routes over deserts and lofty mountains are difficult to negotiate, the rates are accordingly high. For instance, it costs $55 to fly from Hamadan to Bagdad, about 500 kilometers, compared with $16.50 from Frankfurt to Berlin, about the same distance. But the rate by automobile is $65, to which must be added incidental expenses and the risks of the road. One reason for the high rate charged by the Junkers Company is the fact that the government subsidy of about 29 cents a flight kilometer which it received upon the establishment of its Persian service in February, 1927, was continued for only eighteen months, since which time the company has had to depend upon its own wings.

Its seven planes are in constant use both Summer and Winter on the lines linking up Teheran with Hamadan, Bagdad, Ispahan, Shiraz, Bushire, Baku, Kermanshah, Meshed and Pahveli. Beside the regular weekly or semi-weekly passenger services maintained among the cities mentioned, there is a daily freight service between Bushore on the Persian Gulf and Shiraz, the first important town on the way to Teheran, which handles about 100 tons of goods a month.

It is estimated that to transport the same amount by mule caravan in the same time would require 700 animals and seventy drivers. To do it with automobiles would require five three-ton trucks. And transportation on the ground is always subject to bandit raids, against which the rate of insurance is very high. The increasing dependence of Persian commerce upon the airplane is also shown by the rapid rise in the number of letters carried. Connections for abroad are made at Baku with the Soviet Union and at Bagdad and Bushire with the lines of the British Imperial Airways Company. A Persian diplomat recently flew from Teheran to Berlin in three days, a trip that takes at least ten days by rail.

Among the handicaps being overcome by the Junkers fliers are the long distances between airports (they average about 350 kilometers) and the absence of hangars. Even at the home port of Teheran the all-metal planes are exposed to the burning heat of the Persian sun in Summer, while in Winter they often find themselves parked in a couple of feet of snow.

PROPOSED FLIGHT LIMIT OVER CITY HELD UNSAFE

Altitude of 7,000 Feet Would Mean Blind Flying in Clouds, Pilots and Field Managers Say—Growing Safety Record Cited Despite Recent Crashes

By LEO A. KIERAN.

UNDER the impetus of persons with the public interest at heart, however ignorant of actual flying limits and conditions, a demand has arisen for regulation of flights over the New York metropolitan area far exceeding in strictness any former regulations set by the Department of Commerce. If the demands were strictly enforced they would limit crossings over the populated districts to less than half present volume, in the opinion of weather experts, airline operators and field managers in the vicinity of New York.

Leaders in aviation said last week the industry did not oppose the limiting of private flying over New York City, but that it wished to avoid the establishment of a precedent which would be set up by acquiescing to demands of municipalities for conditions which would hamper the growth of air traffic solely because of the mistakes of a few inexperienced pilots who have had accidents which brought severe, if unjust, criticism on the industry itself.

A tabulation of the flying activities at local flying fields reveals a remarkable record of safety, despite the unfortunate failures which have resulted in loss of life and property during recent months.

The detailed report of aircraft accidents during the last year, with its analysis of the causes of those which might have been avoided, shows that faulty flying was responsible for 63 per cent, poor judgment for 19 per cent, carelessness for 14 per cent, while only the remaining 4 per cent could be charged up to direct violations of safety regulations. The number of accidents covered by this analysis was 82 per cent of the total number investigated by the Department of Commerce throughout the period.

300 Planes at Roosevelt.

At Roosevelt Field are nearly 300 airplanes which are in daily or frequent use. Some of these are owned by the field management and are subject to regulation by the operations officer. Others, which are privately owned, are only subject to rule on the runways, taking off or landing, the sphere of their operations depending on the whims of the owners, most of whom are experienced fliers who have regard for the safety of their planes and for their own safety.

They appreciate the rules of safety as outlined by the Department of Commerce for the good of the industry, and seldom exceed the limits set by this code, often increasing its scope voluntarily. The comparatively few pilots who make hazardous flights are usually those of limited experience.

A résumé of the activities at the Curtiss-Wright Airport at Valley Stream reveals a similar condition with its twenty school planes and its fleet of rental, charter and taxi planes. The air mileage of each field runs almost into seven figures each quarter, with more coming from Newark Airport, Hadley Field, the Barrett Airways at Armonk, the Holmes Airport in Queens and the new airport at Flushing.

The schools exercise strict supervision over student flights and impress the embryo pilots with the fact that rules are made in the interests of themselves and the profession of flying. Figures show that most of the older pilots passed the most dangerous stages of their careers at the time when they had had about 200 hours' experience.

The figures of a recent fair day at Roosevelt Field showed a total of 416 landings and take-offs, no accidents of any sort and hundreds of passengers carried. Curtiss-Wright Airport has equivalent tabulations on its records.

7,000 Feet Held Dangerous.

Proposed regulations for flying over New York City prohibit flights under 7,000 feet in altitude. The condition presupposes that any such flight be carried through, although weather averages show the cloud ceiling much below that point throughout the year. Thus pilots who fly over scheduled routes with mail and passengers would be forced to fly blind over the city and even the average good pilot is reluctant about such flying unless it is absolutely necessary.

Even with men of more than average ability and experience, tests in blind flying in clouds have shown poor results. The greater number of pilots fly into the cloud and, within a few minutes, spin out at the bottom. They may be qualified to bring the plane out of a spin at will in fair weather. But students of spinning and blind flying agree that, with present equipment, such flights cannot be made commercially. At the same time they say that spinning is not a menace with good visibility as long as average ability is present in the pilot.

Thus the industry argues its case. With records of safety growing better per capita flown, per dollar invested and per miles of travel, it welcomes any constructive regulations, but insists that such rules come from those with an accurate knowledge of the problems of aviation rather than from some arbitrary standard of municipal control which does not take into account the economic value of air transportation with its resultant advantage to the community in general.

NEVADA DIVORCE AND MARRIAGE LAWS BRING AIRLINE PATRONS

Technical Residence Can Be Maintained, but Outings Enjoyed by Use of Planes to Coast

WHEN the lawmakers of the sovereign State of Nevada were casting about for means to further enhance the commonweal they passed the divorce laws which have made the State and its leading city, Reno, internationally famous. These lawmakers also did something constructive, without a notion they were doing so, for the advancement of aeronautics.

If one wishes to take advantage of the divorce laws in Nevada one must establish a residence there. That residence must be in fact as well as in name. It is necessary to remain within the State's borders during the period of residence save for very brief excursions. It has remained for aviation to provide the means for the seekers after divorces to both have their cakes and eat them, to live in the State and yet visit outside its boundaries.

This means is provided by the Boeing Lines between Salt Lake and San Francisco and, since the institution of night-flying, multimotored transports, the line has been so thoroughly patronized by temporary residents of Nevada that the night plane leaving Reno airport at 1:30 o'clock in the morning and arriving at Oakland three hours later has come to be known as the "Divorce Special." The same name is being applied to the eastbound night passenger transport which takes off at Oakland at 8 o'clock in the evening and arrives at Reno at 10:15 o'clock.

Another difference between the laws of California and of Nevada has helped increase the patronage of the airline. In California three days before one marries there must be a declaration of intent to wed. Nevada requires no such pause. The result has been that couples not wishing to wait the three days hop the plane for Reno and after crossing the Sierras in the two-hour flight can take advantage of Reno's invitation to marry without any declaration of intention.

Recently a San Francisco merchant chartered one of trimotored planes and took a wedding party of ten to Reno, where the wedding ceremony was performed. A late wedding dinner or a very early wedding breakfast was enjoyed and the whole party, including the bride and groom, flew back to San Francisco the same night.

Perhaps no other division of the Transcontinental offers more variety of scenery than this link of the Boeing Line. It is 184 miles from Reno to Oakland. The big trimotor, whose three Hornets develop about 1,700 horsepower, climbs from the Reno airport to 8,000 feet in less than ten minutes. This altitude is sufficient to go through the passes on a clear night. If there is fog the pilot shoves up through to 12,000 feet to clear the peaks with a good margin of safety.

From this height, after some minutes of flying, Lake Tahoe comes into view as the bold crags of the Carson range slip past. If there is a moon the snow-capped peaks glisten with light. Once over the summit of the Sierras the pilot cuts his engines a trifle and the plane settles into the long glide for Oakland.

LUFTHANSA'S EARNINGS UP COMPARED TO SUBSIDIES

ALTHOUGH the Lufthansa in Germany is still far from being on its own financial feet, or wings, data presented to a general stockholders' meeting, held recently in Berlin, showed a material rise in its actual earnings last year, as compared with income from subsidies.

Of last year's receipts of 30,500,000 marks (worth 23.8 cents each) 31.8 per cent represented money really earned, against 68.2 per cent advanced by the Reich and various political entities, whereas in the previous year's intake of 30,000,000 marks the percentages were 26.7 and 73.3. Due partly to economies forced by the reduction in current subsidies already reported, the number of types of airplanes used by the Lufthansa has been reduced from twenty-one to eleven.

Another measure of economy announced at the meeting and approved by the stockholders was the dropping of insurance upon the company's 163 planes, valued at 11,610,000 marks, and the setting up of a special fund to cover fire and other risks. It was explained that the outside insurance covering accidents to passengers and the company's plants would be continued.

Operating cost last year was put at 29 pfennigs per flown kilometer (about 11 cents per mile). The kilometrage in 1928 was 10,220,000, against 9,210,000 in 1927. The number of passengers rose from 102,681 to 111,115, the mail carried from 274,073 kilos to 317,588 and the freight from 846,929 to 1,185,248 kilos.

PREDICTS BIG ROLE FOR NEW AIRSHIPS

Department of Commerce Sees Wide Services On Land and Sea for Dirigibles—Changes in Fuel, Engines and Hull Likely

HOW will the dirigible fit into the transportation scheme of tomorrow's commerce? What is the future of the airship? These questions are now in the minds of forward-looking business men.

Widespread interest in the subject justifies, in the opinion of the Department of Commerce, serious consideration and perhaps a few predictions based upon recent achievements.

In view of the world flight of the Graf Zeppelin, says a recent bulletin of the aeronautics branch of the department, it is not surprising that a number of authorities on air transportation have declared that the dirigible, as now developed, is superior to the airplane for transoceanic flying. There is no conflict between airplanes and lighter-than-air craft, the bulletin continues. The increased use of one will inevitably benefit the other.

"Because the airship has demonstrated," it says, "that it possesses certain advantages such as the ability to engage in prolonged flights with substantial pay loads, it seems very probable that commercial airship routes for long distance commercial transportation will be established in the relatively near future. In fact, preliminary plans for a proposed Zeppelin transport line on the Pacific extending to Hawaii and later to the Orient have been brought before the Postoffice Department by officials of the Goodyear Zeppelin Company with a view to an application for a mail contract.

"Another development—which would indicate that the day of regular transoceanic airship service, carrying passengers, mail and possibly small package freight, is drawing near—is the recent incorporation of the International Zeppelin Transport Company.

"Because the greatest flow of traffic has always been from east to west and west to east rather than north and south, it seems likely that the first lighter-than-air routes will be east and west. In this connection, it might be noted that the Graf Zeppelin on its recent world flight was so favored by the winds that much of the time it used only three of its five motors—thus apparently confirming the theory that circling the globe from west to east has its advantages. A possible result, demonstrated by this flight, is a scheduled, round-the-world service in twenty days or less.

"The most likely immediate developments, however, are for transoceanic and long-distance overland hauls. Among the first routes to be inaugurated will probably be one from Europe to the United States or from a west-coast point to the Hawaiian Islands; another which may soon follow will be from Europe to South America; and, in time, we shall undoubtedly have dirigible lines between North America and South America.

"Naturally, there will be modifications and improvements in present lighter-than-air equipment. Instead of employing heavy liquid fuel of the kind used in present airplane and automobile engines, the airship will perhaps use one of several satisfactory fuel gases—such as blaugas, ethane, propane, or mephane—or it may be that the Diesel-type engine will be developed to the point of practical application. In either case it should result in a substantial economical advantage by increasing payload capacity.

Larger Diameter Probable.

"We may expect, also, a number of changes in construction—one of which will probably be increased diameter in respect to length. Tomorrow's ships will undoubtedly be much larger than are the largest which have flown to date. Engines, too, may be increased appreciably in size or number, in order to develop additional speed and decrease the hazards of wind and weather. It is possible that pneumatic floats or other types of gear will be devised, and that the airship of the future will possess certain seaworthy characteristics. Certainly they will be constructed so as to invite maximum traffic—by making comfort commensurate with speed, convenience and safety.

"It is equally certain that substantial changes will be made in mooring and hangar facilities, in order to do away with the present requirements for large landing crews.

"These and other improvements will come in time. Already, however, the dirigible has demonstrated its possibilities as a safe, reliable, time-saving, comfortable craft, suitably adapted for carrying heavy loads of passengers, mail and express on commercial service over long, non-stop flights. As soon as it is augmented by the proper ground organizations, including terminal facilities, mooring masts, radio stations and meteorological service, the rigid airship should be capable of maintaining regular scheduled service to any part of the globe.

Time Saving Appreciated.

"The fact that lighter-than-air craft can combine with speed and directness of route the ability to carry large cargoes and cruise thousands of miles without stopping presages the increasing use of these air liners. For all the world is beginning to appreciate the value of time, is becoming more intensely interested in any transport medium which saves time, is anxious and willing to be convinced that the expensive flight of time can be retarded by flying.

"Because the airship is capable of shrinking the map of the globe to a third of its former size, because it is capable of transporting hundreds of passengers and tons of mail and merchandise across thousands of miles of intervening land or water, the dirigible will have a highly important place in the commerce of tomorrow; and, with the airplane, will play a major rôle in the colossal drama of world-wide peace and prosperity which so auspiciously now unfolds."

NOTES FROM FIELD OF AVIATION

SPECIAL examinations for appointments as Second Lieutenants in the United States Army Air Corps are to be held during the weeks of Feb. 17 and Feb. 22, 1930. These examinations were authorized by the air corps act of 1926 when it appeared that there might be a dearth of active fliers in the army. At this time, however, according to War Department instructions to the Second Corps area, there are but twenty vacancies to be filled. The examinations will be open to qualified fliers between the ages of 21 and 30 and who are members of the regular army, National Guard, or Reserve Corps. Qualified civilians will be admitted to the Reserve Corps to establish their eligibility.

THE French Air Service is reported to have 2,000 planes "on the line" ready for service with fliers enough to man them, and 2,000 more in storage ready to be handled by the trained reserves of France which could be commissioned within two weeks. There are also spare parts, motors and other accessories, including wings, enough in reserve to keep these 4,000 planes in the air indefinitely.

THE time is probably not very far distant, reports Assistant Trade Commissioner Charles F. Stephenson, when Argentina will be well equipped with airlines connecting it not only with the rest of the world but with intra-national lines extending throughout the entire country. More mail is handled per capita than in any other nation, according to postoffice statistics, reaching 224 pieces per inhabitant as compared with 214 pieces in the United States, 147 in France, 143 in England, 121 in Germany and 28 in Brazil.

THREE brothers in one family are now fliers. Last week the two older men joined their younger brother as licensed pilots after studying at Roosevelt Field for several months. The three brothers, Frank, William and John, are the sons of Frank Black, former Commissioner of Agriculture of Pennsylvania. Their home is at Meyersdale, Pa.

AMONG the 532 war planes composing the air defenses of the Czechoslovak Republic are several pursuit planes of the Avia BH-33 type, which are held to be among the very swiftest in all Europe. These pursuers climb to an altitude of 10,000 meters and fly at a top speed of 265 kilometers an hour. Some of the new planes carry machine guns capable of firing 1,500 shots a minute. In addition to the planes in regular service in the army, there is a reserve of about 800 commercial and private units, according to the Pester Lloyd, a leading Budapest newspaper, which says that the higher technical officers in the Czechoslovak force receive final instruction in the military aviation school near Paris.

AIR ASSOCIATES has been appointed distributer for the Bendix Corporation in the New York and Chicago territories. Air Associates have maintained hangars and stores at both flying fields for several years. The commodities controlled by the Bendix group include Pioneer instruments, Delco and Scintilla ignition systems, Stromberg carburetors, Eclipse starters and generators and Bendix wheels and brakes for aircraft.

CANADIAN TRANSCONTINENTAL AIRWAYS, Ltd., operating from Quebec with Fairchilds, Loenings and Stearmans, has been absorbed by the Aviation Corporation of Canada, Ltd. The old company was formed late in 1927 and during 1928 showed a record of operation covering 544 flight hours over 56,000 miles with 1,320 passengers, 94,185 pounds of mail and 65,547 pounds of freight. The operators are experienced in Winter flying, having successfully conducted lines in midwinter between the Monoton and Magdelan Islands and on through Charlottetown, P. E. I.

A WASP engined tri-motored Ford monoplane has been ordered by Parks Air College, East St. Louis, Mo., for its fleet of instruction planes. Two Ryan B-3 monoplanes, powered by Wright J-5s, have also been ordered for immediate delivery. Under a new flying curriculum which goes into effect immediately, the college will give each transport pilot student seven hours instruction on the tri-motor.

THE first plane to be manufactured by the newly organized Civilian Aircraft Company of England is the Civilian coupe, a small two-seater monoplane with the 75-85 horsepower A. B. C. Hornet four-cylinder engine. The plane has windows all around the cabin, giving a view of the wing and fuselage, and a door on each side of the cabin. Maximum speed of 100 miles an hour is expected and a cruising speed of 83 miles.

AN aerial potato race was the feature of an air circus at Parks Airport near St. Louis, Mo., recently. In the potato race contesting pilots were required after each circuit of the course to land, alight from their planes, pick up a potato and take off again. ARMY PILOTS' TALK IN AIR HEARD 200 MILES AWAY

A DEMONSTRATION of what can be accomplished with the present type of radio equipment employed by the Air Corps was given recently by Lieutenants R. O. S. Akre and L. M. Bawsel, student officers taking the communications course at the Air Corps Technical School, Chanute Field, Ill. On a cross-country flight from that field to Decorah, Iowa, a distance of 275 miles, they kept in continuous two-way radio communication with the communications department ground radio station, operated by Sergeant Lawrence Bullington, for 2 hours 45 minutes.

The school airplane, a Douglas 02-C, was equipped with the radio transmitting and receiving set, type SCR-134, and transmission was on tone telegraph at a frequency of 500 kilocycles. The ground (school) radio station, using tone telegraph also, sent on a frequency of 350 kilocycles.

During the flight the Chanute Field ground station frequently heard Lieutenant Akre, pilot, and Lieutenant Bawsel, observer, talking to each other over the interphone system installed in the airplane, and at a distance of about 200 miles a two-way telephone conversation was held between the airplane and ground station with excellent results.

PLAN AIRLINE TO LINK NANKING WITH YUNNAN

AMBITIOUS plans to link Nanking, capital of the National Government, with distant and inaccessible Yunnan Province by two airlines, are said to be in a fair way to be realized. The scheme includes establishment of two lines from Nanking to Yunnanfu, capital of Yunnan Province, and these lines would link up the provinces of Hunan, Kiangse, Kwangsi and Kawngtung with Nanking as well. A fund of $2,000,000 is sought for the enterprise, which is backed by General Liu Lei-chuan, head of the Yunnan air forces.

Aviation is making remarkable developments under the Nanking régime. The daily air service between Shanghai and Nanking, transporting four passengers and mail each way daily between this city and the capital, has become so popular that all passages are booked many days in advance.

OIL COMPANY COMPLETING LONG LINE OF AIR BEACONS

THE aviation beacon program of the Richfield Oil Company, entailing the erection of a beacon about every fifty miles between the Mexican and Canadian borders on the Pacific Coast, is rapidly drawing to completion. Erection of beacons on the Eastern coast is planned. Twenty-seven of these beacons already are lighted, and crews are working on the erection of six more.

The beacons are triangular in shape, of steel construction, and 127 feet high. Neon lights mark two sides. The towers are to be surmounted by powerful revolving lights. In conjunction with these beacon towers, auto and airplane fueling service stations are being erected.

New Helium Tank Ready.

A NEW tank for storing helium gas, used for the inflation of dirigibles, was recently completed at Scott Field, at Belleville, Ill., at a cost of $48,000. The tank has a capacity of 300,000 cubic feet. Another tank at the field has a capacity of 500,000 cubic feet.

EXTENSION OF RADIO WILL AID SAFE FLYING ALONG AIRWAYS

Department of Commerce Plans Many Stations To Provide Weather Information

WITH the selection of a site for the building of a directive radio beacon at the East Boston airport—for charting an air lane over the New York-Boston Airway—five additional beacon stations for guiding airplanes are in process of construction or completed.

Speaking of the stations, F. C. Hingsburg, chief engineer of the Airways Division, United States Department of Commerce, said last week:

"The Airways Division operates in conjunction with the Weather Bureau in disseminating weather information along the airways and maintains a series of radio stations for the exchange of weather information and the dispatch of airplanes. This system of communication is supplemented by telephone and teletype for point-to-point communication. Three radio broadcast stations are now operating at Hadley Field, Bellefonte and Cleveland, and broadcast weather information and landing conditions at the airports and principal intermediate fields along the route throughout the day and night.

"The telephone transmitters are 2,000-watt capacity, broadcasting the voice in the band between 315 and 350 kilocycles, with a reliable range of 125 miles.

Pilot Can Alter Course.

"Before taking off, the pilot may obtain complete weather data covering the airway to be flown, and after departure, will receive hourly reports on the landing and weather conditions along the route. If landing at the terminal field becomes impossible, owing to poor visibility, the hourly reports on landing conditions at intermediate fields and alternate terminal fields permit the pilot to choose an alternate field and land with safety to discharge passengers and cargo or to await more favorable conditions.

"The radio broadcast stations established by the Department of Commerce will accept any message required for safety and transmit it to the pilot in flight. A simple receiver aboard the airplane will enable the pilot to take advantage of the radio service. The stations of the department will maintain a constant watch on 333 and 4,036 kilocycles for emergency and distress messages for airplanes equipped with transmitters, and will handle any communications required for the safety of flight.

Plan for Landing Aids.

"As communications to airplanes under conditions of poor visibility must necessarily be made by radio, it will be necessary to provide for communicating landing directions at airports by means of radio-telephone. One frequency for that purpose will be made available from the channels set up by the Federal Radio Commission. The radio transmitters at airports must have limited power and range not in excess of five miles, so as to prevent interference between neighboring airports. Under this plan of having all airport transmitters on the same frequency, the pilot will listen for landing directions upon approaching an airport and will follow the orders as to landing procedure received from the airport manager. The frequency tentatively established for airport transmitters is in the 400 to 500 kilocycle band.

"A problem of the future that has received serious consideration is the development of instruments for bringing an airplane to a safe landing under conditions of poor visibility. This must necessarily be accomplished by radio in one form or another. The ground facilities required for this purpose, such as leader cables, marker beacons or other radio devices for outlining the landing field and taking the airplane over the track of a clear approach must be installed by airports in the future and require the reservation of radio frequencies."

Thousands of families, perhaps yours included, spend more for Christmas gifts to one another than the amount required for the down-payment on a new De Soto Six.

There's lots of merit, common sense and sound economy in the plan of pooling the individual Yuletide expenditures of your family for the purchase of a car.

Long after the gifts exchanged have been used up and forgotten, a De Soto Six still will be serving all of you—providing fast, safe and convenient transportation over any distance and in all seasons.

Perhaps you already have a car—but nowadays it is difficult for one automobile to serve four or five people. Give some thought to the advantages of a second car, and investigate the plan of pooling the individual expenditures of your family to get it.

If you order a De Soto Six this week, delivery by Christmas is assured.

AUTOMOBILES ON THE HIGHWAYS AND IN THE NEWS

BALMY SOUTH DRAWS NORTHERN MOTORISTS

Those Touring Through South Carolina, Georgia and Neighboring States This Season Will Find Improved Networks Of Highways — News of Other Roads

By LEON A. DICKINSON.

AS WINTER blows a chillier breath, Northern motorists in greater numbers turn toward the South. And in that region this year road aspects promise to be as cheerful as is the atmosphere, for South Atlantic States have made remarkable progress in the improvement of their highways. The dyed-in-the-wool automobilist may now invade that section of the country with assurance of traveling over good surfaces wherever he roams.

To be sure, not all of these motorways are paved, but most of them offer modern types of hard surfacing; even where pavement does not rule, the surface is usually fair-to-good gravel or sand-clay. Those who stick to the main roads should fear no trouble so far as ground conditions go.

Reference to the accompanying map of the main roads in South Carolina and Georgia will show that it is now possible to drive through to Jacksonville along no less than three trunk routes, each of which provides good pavement practically all the way. The shortest of these is the route leading south from Washington through Richmond and Raleigh, entering South Carolina a few miles southwest of Lumberton. The route this far offers uninterrupted pavement all the way from New York to the village of Sellers, which is about twenty miles beyond the State line in South Carolina.

From this place to the junction with U. S. Route 17 there is a stretch of about six or seven miles of unpaved but fair surfaced road. After that Route 17 will be followed all the way to Jacksonville by way of Florence, Charleston, Savannah and Brunswick. The pavement throughout this section of the trip is uninterrupted except for a short detour at the Santee Canal and another about five miles south of Moncks Corner. Both of these are located between Florence and Charleston, and no difficulty will be experienced in negotiating them, save perhaps in very wet weather. There is another stretch of about two miles of unpaved road near Yemassee, between Walterboro and Savannah, but this is in good condition at all times.

Through Southern Pines.

Those who drive over the slightly longer route through Wilmington will avoid the unpaved stretch south of Sellers, but must travel over the others unless they follow an entirely different route, such as U. S. Route 1. This latter leads southwest from Raleigh through Southern Pines, entering South Carolina just south of Rockingham.

At the State line the pavement ends and will not be picked up again for more than fifty miles. The first ten-mile stretch into Cheraw is in good condition, but from that town to McBee the main road is now under construction. This necessitates a long detour of fully thirty-five miles, comprising a section of Route 9 to Chesterfield and then along Route 95 for twenty-two miles, rejoining U. S. Route 1 just north of McBee. No section of this detour is paved and its condition is only fair at best. In wet weather it would doubtless be quite muddy and slippery in places. Once at McBee, however, the motorist will find uninterrupted pavement most of the way to Jacksonville, passing through Camden, Columbia, Aiken, Augusta, Swainsboro and Waycross.

In spite of the rather long stretch of unpaved highway, this continues to be a popular route, as Camden Columbia and Aiken are well-known resort cities with excellent hotel accommodations. It is possible to avoid the long detour mentioned above by going into Columbia by way of Greensboro (or Winston-Salem) and Charlotte. However, this too has a stretch of nearly thirty miles that is unpaved, but it is reported to be in good condition throughout. The unpaved portion begins about ten miles south of Chester, on the road from Charlotte to Columbia, and the pavement does not begin again until one approaches to within about seventeen miles of the latter city.

Still another route followed by many who travel to Florida and the Gulf Coast resorts is that through Charlotte, Greenville and Atlanta. This is mostly paved, but there still remain four or five stretches between Charlotte and Atlanta that are not hard-surfaced. Most of these are surface-treated, though, and permit of rapid traveling. The rest of this route provides good pavement all the way to Florida. It runs via Atlanta, Macon, Tifton and Valdosta, and is marked as U. S. 19 from Gainesville to Atlanta, and then as U. S. 41 from that city to Lake City, Fla.

The longest way of all is the route through the Shenandoah Valley, southwestern Virginia and Knoxville, Tenn., following U. S. Route 11 all the way from Pennsylvania to Chattanooga. Here one should turn southward and follow U. S. Route 41 through Atlanta and Macon direct to Florida. This route is paved practically throughout and offers magnificent scenery. Another pictorial possibility is to turn south at Bristol into the famous "Land of the Sky" around Asheville. One may drive from there over good roads to either Atlanta or Augusta, from which places uninterrupted pavement stretches southward to Florida.

State's Road Expenditures.

A REPORT by George C. Donahue, chairman of the Good Roads Committee of the New York State Automobile Association, indicates that this State is spending approximately $22,000,000 each year on highway reconstruction and an additional $3,000,000 for rebuilding bridges.

Such appropriations, the association contends, are "entirely inadequate," and it believes that the annual expenditure for reconstruction should be increased to some $40,000,000, which would mean the appropriation by the State of more than $60,000,000 a year for all highway purposes.

New York, with close to 14,000 miles of State highways—second only to Texas—is building and rebuilding between 600 and 750 miles of road every year, the report points out, adding that a number of other States are annually improving a greater mileage.

Construction in New Jersey.

LOW temperatures and snow-covered ground have caused a shutdown of concrete laying on New Jersey highways. This, except on a few short stretches, halts construction for the season.

One important section the State will endeavor to complete is on Route 25, on the south side of the Raritan River. It is expected that this work will be finished to permit the opening of the new bridge over the Raritan, east of New Brunswick. The tentative date is Dec. 15, but weather conditions may interfere with this plan. Should the link be opened to travel, the super-highway toward Trenton will be ready for traffic from Elizabeth south to the State capital.

The "Cheesequake cut-off," part of Route 4, is open from South Amboy to Matawan. Motorists headed toward Freehold, Lakewood and Atlantic City will appreciate this new route, since it eliminates Keyport. The new cut-off road is picked up by driving out along Bordentown Avenue, South Amboy.

The new highway toward Easton, that avoids Elizabeth, Plainfield, Bound Brook and Somerville, cannot be completed this season. The Scotch Plains-North Plainfield section is 62 per cent done; the North Plainfield-Chimney Rock section is 35 per cent finished and the Chimney Rock-Raritan section is 67 per cent completed. The important link from Newark Airport to Hillside is graded most of the way, but steel work for overhead bridges is not in place.

A new State route, 39, Trenton to Hammonton, has been widened and graded from Bordentown to Chambers Corners; 5 per cent of the work is completed from Chambers Corners to Pemberton; the seven miles from South Pemberton to Oak Shade is 61 per cent complete; Oak Shade to Indian Mills, seven miles of new route through the pines, is 83 per cent finished, while the balance of the route is being graded and traffic is using the old pavement.

Mr. Hoover on Roads.

IN the course of his message to Congress last week President Hoover had this to say anent the development of our highways:

There are over 3,000,000 miles of legally established highways in the United States, of which about 10 per cent are included in the State highway systems, the remainder being county and other local roads. About 626,000 miles have been improved with some type of surfacing, comprising some 63 per cent of the State highway systems and 16 per cent of the local roads. Of the improved roads about 102,000 miles are hard surfaced, comprising about 22 per cent of the State highway systems and about 8 per cent of the local roads.

While proper planning should materially reduce the listed mileage of public roads, particularly in the agricultural districts, and turn these roads back to useful purposes, it is evident that road construction must be a long-continued program. Progress in improvement is about 50,000 miles of all types per annum, of which some 12,000 miles are of the more durable types. The expenditures of Federal, State and local governments last year for construction and maintenance assumed the huge total of $1,660,000,000.

Federal aid in the construction of the highway systems in conjunction with the States has proved to be beneficial and stimulating. We must ultimately give consideration to the increase of our contribution to these systems, particularly with a view to stimulating the improvement of farm-to-market roads.

Vermont Conditions.

ALL the road jobs on roads leading from Bennington northward and eastward in Vermont have been completed, reports The Bennington Garage. Continuing, it says:

The gravel roads are now showing some effect of the action of frost, but it has not yet created a more serious condition than a bit of smeariness on the surface, and this only at the higher altitudes. On the mountain roads there has been some snow, but in every case it has soon melted. There has been icy sleet on the hard-surfaced roads north of Rutland, but this condition did not last long.

Motorists must now come prepared for such conditions. They will, however, be able to travel anywhere in Vermont for some weeks to come unless we get unusually severe storms.

Pennsylvania Prepares.

PENNSYLVANIA is mobilizing an army of 15,000 men and much material in preparation for the 1930 construction work under supervision of the Department of Highways. The campaign involves construction and replacement of some 1,300 miles of highways.

Long Island Sound Ferries.

OF THE ferries crossing Long Island Sound only one that carries automobiles is now running, according to the Long Island Chamber of Commerce. The Port Jefferson-Bridgeport ferry is now on Winter schedule of three trips a week, leaving Port Jefferson at 9:15 A. M. and Bridgeport at 3 P. M. on Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays.

PLAN VAST SNOW REMOVAL

PRELIMINARY reports received by the American Automobile Association indicate that more than 160,000 miles of main highways in the thirty-six States in the snow belt will be kept open and free from snow during the present Winter. Approximately $6,500,000 will be expended by States and counties for this extensive program.

"The mileage of roads kept free from snow is being increased each year as the motor vehicle more and more demonstrates its value in the economic life of the nation," the association states. "In the Winter of 1927-1928 a total of more than 117,000 miles of roads were cleared of snow. Last Winter the total mileage was around 125,000.

"As an added precaution, there is now 5,916 miles of snow fence erected along the important highways in the snow States to keep drifts from forming on roadways. Throughout the snow States there are 6,865 trucks, 2,557 tractors and 3,061 graders used in the relentless battle against snow. Operators of these utilities are in constant communication with Weather Bureau authorities and are prepared to go into action as soon as snow begins to fall.

"The mileage of roads kept open ranges from 282 miles in Arizona to 25,028 miles in New York State. Wisconsin will keep 19,800 miles of highway cleared.

"Cost of clearing the highways, based on the 1926-27 figures, averages $45.18 per mile, ranging from $6.40 per mile in Virginia, the southern boundary of the snow belt, to $136.32 per mile in Wyoming, in the Northwest."

HINTS TO DRIVERS.

By FREDERICK C. RUSSELL.

IF the engine will not start after being parked out for some time on a cold, damp night, water probably has formed on the spark plugs through condensation. The remedy is to lift the hood and dry them off.

THE INDUSTRY REPORTS

TRANSPORT leaders from many countries are reported arriving daily in New York in order to participate in the International Day program to be held on Jan. 6 at the offices of the National Automobile Chamber of Commerce, in conjunction with the national show scheduled at the Grand Central Palace for Jan. 4-11. George F. Bauer, secretary of the export department of the chamber, is coming from Africa, bringing reports of industrial advance in that continent and in South America.

Expect Ford Announcement.

CURRENT rumors relative to the Ford Motor Company's improved Model A have it that an official announcement in that connection is now imminent. Those reputed to be "in the know" declare that this announcement will come within the next ten days, or at any rate before the end of the year. Reports are to the effect that the new Fords will be considerably larger than the present line, with streamline bodies, larger tires, smaller wheels and a complete rearrangement of the interior.

THE MOTOR CAR FIELD IN FOREIGN LANDS

ANOTHER indication of the increasing importance of the automobile in Hungarian life is found in the recent issuing of an order by the Ministry of the Interior requiring all drivers to stop and render what assistance they can in case of road accidents. Immediately following this decree the Royal Hungarian Automobile Club established a course of first-aid instruction for its members, with several Budapest physicians as teachers.

As is pointed out in the Hungarian press, the freemasonry obtaining among automobilists generally is strong enough to insure aid in time of trouble, but the governmental authorities apparently are taking no chances.

According to data given out by the Royal Hungarian Central Statistical Bureau, there were 18,741 automobiles in the country on Oct. 1 last and 10,268 motorcycles.

Motoring in Holland.

HOLLAND is making rapid strides in the improvement of its network of highways, according to the Netherlands News Bureau of New York, which adds:

Such improvement has been especially marked during the course of this year. For this year the sum of 27,000,000 guilders was set aside for the modernizing of existing roads and the building of new ones. The new highway from Amsterdam, through the well-known Gooi region, to Amersfoort, which will be completed by 1932, is only one of the many new roads under construction.

True, generally speaking, the highways are not so wide as those in the United States, but their surface is second to none. Most of the roads are either bitumen-macadam, brick or cement, each of which provides an excellent driving surface.

No native, and even no foreigner, needs to lose his way, as at all crossroads and corners signposts are erected through the care of the Dutch Touring Club (A. N. W. B.), giving names as well as distances.

A Speedway for Spain.

SPAIN has started work on a new modern automobile speedway. The highway will stretch 260 miles from Madrid to San Sebastian. It will be thirty-six feet wide with six feet set aside for parking. The curves are to be made wide and will be banked. Where other roads cross the speedway they will be either elevated or tunneled. In the last few years, it is reported, much has been done to improve roads in Spain. Highways between Barcelona and the French border and between Barcelona and Madrid are finished and have been opened to tourist traffic. Though not so broad as the new speedway, these roads are well surfaced.

No German Show Until 1931.

ALTHOUGH the automobile exposition held in Berlin in 1928 attracted large numbers of persons and undoubtedly did a great deal toward helping the German motor vehicle industry, the National Association of the German Automobile Industry has decided not to hold another show until the Spring of 1931. This decision has drawn caustic comment from a number of leading German newspapers, among them the Frankfurter Zeitung, which points out that it hardly appears consistent for the German car manufacturers to give up holding expositions at home while at the same time making their appearance at foreign shows in full force, as was the case at the recent automobile exposition in Paris.

The paper admits that the financial situation of many German car makers is not at all favorable and that the expense of running a show is heavy, but it concludes:

"After all, one must consider not only the temporary economic situation, but also the psyche of the purchaser. The invasion of foreign products is still alarming. Consequently, one shouldn't create the impression of a fear of competition through inaction, perhaps justifiable commercially."

FAULTY BRAKES BLAMED FOR NUMEROUS MISHAPS

FAULTY brakes are responsible for more than one-third of the serious automobile accidents in the United States attributed to defective equipment, according to a survey by the American Research Foundation.

Analysis of accident records in thirteen large cities and five States disclosed, the survey says, that of 4,809 motor vehicles involved in accidents in which defective equipment was reported, 39 per cent had defective brakes.

FINDS "NEW NOTE" AT MOTOR SALON

Visitor Sees a Trend Away From the "Blatantly Jazzy" Toward "Subdued Maturity" in Present-Day Coach Work

By ELIZABETH ONATIVIA.

A GOOD investment is a good investment. This applies specifically to the cars shown at the twenty-fifth annual Automobile Salon at the Commodore last week. Wherefore it seemed a little absurd that many of the visitors should regard these works of art wistfully and solemnly as museum pieces, rather than as possible possessions. However, the salon did 60 per cent of last year's business at the showing in Chicago, which, considering the recent financial unpleasantness, indicates that some of the customers are sneaking out and spending money in spite of their mournful aspects.

It is an odd coincidence that the cars themselves were more subdued this year. The jazzy, modernistic note was not so emphatic. The general effect was that of distinguished maturity. What light-colored cars there were were finished in pastel shades of green and gray and tan. The all-metal novelties were absent. True, the gadgets in the interiors were numerous and arresting, but one rather takes those for granted now, and even in the less expensive cars feels rather hurt if all the minor appliances of boudoir and kitchenette are missing.

The cars as a whole had low-slung bodies, giving an impression of greater length. This has always seemed, not only in fiction, the ideal silhouette, as the stylists say, for automobiles, but one which had not been entirely practical in this country until the development of our better roads. Now, however, it is possible to have this artistic satisfaction and still proceed from point to point.

A car which attracted much attention was a new Cord front-drive roadster, with body by Weymann. This model is known as the "Elysée." Light blue within and without, its most striking feature is the side-facing occasional seat in the rear, and a neat little drop-table opposite, just the thing for a busy man who wants to dictate to his stenographer on the way to his next stop.

Then there was one of the new du Ponts, a torpedo-shaped roadster, that was delightfully ominous. A policeman would think twice before pinning a ticket on that car. The Cadillac roadster with the Fleetwood body was so large that it had all the dignity of a limousine while keeping the informal atmosphere of the sport car. No one could ask more than that.

The new Ruxtons, made by the New Era Motors, Inc., interested many people. These cars, like the Cords, have a front-wheel drive. The carriage work, by Baker-Raulang, Holbrook & Locke, is most impressive, particularly in the matter of the elimination of a running board. This latter innovation is attractive, but disconcerting at first.

The Isotta-Fraschinis contributed the most frivolous note to outward appearances, more particularly in the light brown roadster cabriolet with the Castagna body. They have developed a trick false front which screens the radiator, and to make it even more diverting these false fronts are decorated with metal designs, flashes of lightning and such. The metal cobra used as a radiator cap is an inheritance from the late Rudolph Valentino, for whom it was first designed.

The Mercedes-Benz model was what they called a country club sedan, by Castagna. It looked so comfortable that, having been driven in it to the club, one would probably just go on sitting until it was time to go home. There are wind-shields at the side of the driver's seat—more luxury.

Tucked away behind its older brothers was a subdued red Renault coupé that was most appealing. It gave the effect of being a stocky little person with a snub nose, to be liked and trusted on sight.

The Rolls-Royces with their Brewster carriage work were their own invaluable selves. The Lincolns and the Packards and the Pierce-Arrows gave silent testimony that we still have an automotive industry, in spite of what you may hear to the contrary. And the same goes for such beauteous creations as the Cunningham, Duesenberg and Franklin; the La Salle, Lancia, Minerva and Stutz.

Somehow, dignified beauty was the general effect of the salon. Last year it was all recklessly gay. There was this new idea of color, of individuality, of onyx handles on the wheel, of reptile skin upholstery, of all sorts of items which were new and, be it said, superficial. This year a new spirit was quite suddenly abroad in the land, and in some way it was anticipated again by the coach makers in setting a new standard which includes all the amusing and arresting attributes of the de luxe car, with the new note of dignity, of fundamental and striking uniformity in basic excellence of design. One would have said last year that no more improvements could be made and yet, subtle as they are, they have been made.

One longnetted customer regarded one of the lightish, more striking cars at the salon, and said she didn't care for that "psychic type." She swept away, and paused before an inconspicuous but estimable sedan. "That," she said, "is what I want. It is so restful." And there, in a word, is the new note.

THE CUBAN CENTRAL HIGHWAY IS NOW OPEN TO MOTORISTS

By JAMES P. WELSH.

RAPID progress on Cuba's highway-building program has centred the attention of motorists on the island as the place for a Winter tour, and the Cuban Government has done its share in removing all restrictions on the entry of visiting cars. Now it is only necessary to have a certificate of registration or ownership and the motorist may enter his machine without a penny's cost. At the end of ninety days he may appear at any police station and have his visitor's permit extended an additional ninety days.

More than 70 per cent of Cuba's great 700-mile "Central Highway" has been completed, with the remainder of the route, from end to end of the island, passable over graded and graveled stretches. The 70 per cent of completed highway is paved and winds through country of beauty and interest. Cross-roads from the main highway to cities along both coasts of the island make it possible for the traveler to spend a leisurely month in exploring the "Pearl of the Antilles" as it has never before been possible to explore it.

From the eastern tip of Pinar del Rio to the westernmost point of Oriente Province the road extends, with a conscious—and successful—effort made all along the way to direct the route through the most beautiful sections of the island. A saving in distance has not been attempted. Where a swing of a few miles would carry the highway through an unusually interesting stretch of country, the swing has been made.

And what country! Picturesque mountains. Colorful valleys. Plateaus clothed in tropical verdure. The traveler will thrill over the Sierra de Los Organos and the Sierra del Rosario in Pinar del Rio Province, and a little to the westward of the centre of the island is the great Guaniguanico Range, with its towering peaks, colored in the manner of Maxfield Parrish. In the Guamuhaya group, between Cienfuegos and Trinidad, the traveler will wind his way through the foothills and will gaze at El Poterillo. On the southern coast of Oriente Province is famed Sierra Maestra, including Sierra del Cobre and the Macaca group, with its 8,600-foot Pico Tarquino.

When Cuba started on its highway-building program it did so in a wholehearted manner, realizing that from America it would draw a great volume of tourist travel. The "Central Highway" is built of Warrenite, concrete and asphalt, twenty to thirty feet wide, and steep grades and sharp curves have been eliminated. From end to end there is not a right-angle curve—only long, swinging turns. Crossroads are wide and paved. Scores of cities have paved their streets.

Cuba's highway program, which involved the spending of some $100,000,000, has opened to the tourist the hidden sections of the island known in the past only to the hunter and naturalist. Tropical forests and mountain solitudes. Exotic flowers and valleys of emerald green. Frowning mountains rising out of lush foliage.

Havana is only three or four hours from Florida by boat and the traveler will find that it is possible to drive his car aboard the boat and have it blocked on the deck for the short over-water jump.

BEAR MOUNTAIN OPEN.

A POSTCARD from the Bear Mountain Hudson River Bridge Company relays the information that the bridge, its scenic approach highways and connecting links are open to traffic, despite recent snowfalls. The bridge authorities are also advised that the Storm King Highway is also open.

WORLD WAR ON CANCER MAKES NOTABLE GAINS

Practical Employment of All Available Information and Promotion of Research Regarding the Disease Have Resulted in More Cures and Preventions

PHYSICIANS and research laboratories in many countries are engaged in the war against cancer. The progress of this war is described in the following article. Dr. Soper was for six years director of a national society against cancer and in this capacity visited almost every centre in America and Europe where cancer research is carried on. His latest investigations were made in Europe during the past Summer.

By GEORGE A. SOPER, Ph. D.

NOTABLE progress is being made in the war against cancer. The strength and disposition of the enemy's forces are coming to be better understood. Equipment and methods are being developed which make it possible more and more successfully to combat the foe. Some of the strongest positions are being taken.

The terror with which cancer has been regarded for hundreds of years is no longer warranted. Cancer is undoubtedly one of the world's greatest plagues, but it is by no means the invariably fatal malady which it was once believed to be. Many more cases are being cured and many more prevented than formerly. This is being done partly through the greater cooperation of the patients, who are learning the necessity for early and skillful attention, and partly through the more general employment of methods based on a better understanding of the cancer process.

As time passes it becomes more and more clear that what is called cancer is not a single disease with a definite and invariable train of symptoms, but rather an unwholesome biological condition which gets started in some way or other and cannot always be checked. To effect a cure, the part or parts of the body involved must be so treated as to destroy or remove every particle of the cancerous tissue. The full extent of the growth is invisible, but its probable location must be known to the physician if the patient is to be permanently cured. The successful treatment of a difficult case of cancer is a very scientific accomplishment.

It is through the perfection and more general employment of the scientific method, rather than through any brilliant and inclusive discovery, that reliance must be placed for a further advance in the prevention and cure of cancer, so far, at least, as the immediate future is concerned. This is not saying that the many interesting researches which are being directed at the heart of the subject cannot possibly succeed.

The Immediate Problem.

Some believe that they will result in the discovery of a vaccine or other universally applicable means of protection. Until a completely satisfactory solution of the cancer problem is forthcoming it will be unwise to close the mind to any possibility; in fact, every investigation which can add to the present knowledge of the subject should be encouraged. But we cannot wait. There is a large amount of useful information ready. We must make the fullest use of it. To do this and to encourage others to do it is the duty of every intelligent man and woman.

In the war against cancer, then, we must envisage two great lines of attack. One is the practical employment of every particle of information which it at hand. The other is the promotion of every line of research which promises to add to this information.

The war is proceeding along three fronts. Let us briefly consider them.

First, research into the fundamental reasons why anybody ever has a cancer. Included in this field are studies of inheritance, resistance and susceptibility. The physiological behavior of body cells in health and disease is receiving a large amount of attention. Many hold that the functions of these infinitesimal living units of which the body is composed must be better known before the secret of the cancer process can be revealed. It is no play on words to say that this is a large subject. At Hamburg a professorship of cell physiology has been created.

Cures Without Aid.

Once in a long while a case of cancer gets well without surgical, radiological or other outside aid. Recovery sometimes occurs from implanted tumors in animals, either spontaneously or through methods employed in the laboratory to stimulate body resistance. In view of these facts, efforts are being made to produce a substance which, though harmless in itself, will when injected into the body protect it against cancer and perhaps cause the regression and cure of an established tumor.

Experiments of this kind have thus far been performed only on tumors artificially produced in animals and on cancer tissue which has been grown in glass cells outside of the body. But the results have given encouragement to the belief that such methods may yet prove successful when applied to human beings.

The theory that cancer may be due to a virus or a virus in combination with an enzyme or other activating agent is by no means dead, although the preponderance of evidence is opposed to the belief that all cancers are produced by a single specific kind of parasite. The virus theory of Gye, which aroused so much popular and scientific interest when announced through The Lancet a few years ago, has been the subject of a great deal of research work in all parts of the civilized world, without, however, being confirmed.

The resistance which the normal body ordinarily offers to the cancer process is receiving a good deal of attention from qualified research workers, and the fundamental reasons why it becomes lowered or raised are being carefully investigated.

Second, a great deal of research is being carried on into the immediate, as distinguished from the fundamental, causes of cancer. It has become plain that while susceptibility plays an important part, it is only one of two great factors, both of which are probably concerned in the production of every cancer. The other is some form of local irritation, usually acting over a long interval of time. It is the combination of these two, rather than either one of them acting alone, which produces a cancer. If either is present to a marked degree, the other need not be so.

One thing is obvious: All forms of irritation are not equally dangerous. New light is constantly being shed on the forms which are most likely to lead to cancer and, consequently, especially to be avoided. Certain tars, oils and aniline dyes have been implicated, for example. Practical information has thus been obtained as to the necessity of precautions to be taken by operatives in various industries. Attempts have been made to produce such a substance as may be assumed to occur naturally in living tissues before a cancer is formed. It is probable that if this can be obtained a means of counteracting the disease can be found.

Another line of research with a practical bearing has been the study of the relationship between physical injury and the production of cancer, for it is popularly supposed that a cancer sometimes follows a blow or wound. The result of this inquiry leads to the opinion that the connection, if any, is much less direct than has been commonly supposed. Attempts made to produce cancer of the lung in animals by methods resembling the smoking of cigarettes have failed. These are examples of recent research work into the immediate or exciting causes of cancer.

Third, the development of methods and facilities for diagnosis and treatment. In this direction lies the greatest advance which has been made in recent years against cancer. Through improvements in technique, and, still more, through the intelligent recording and study of what has been accomplished in groups of similar cases treated in the same way, the percentage of cures has steadily risen. This is especially true of radium and X-ray treatment, when employed alone or in combination with surgery. The Radiumhemmet at Stockholm and the Radium Institute of the University of Paris are universally regarded as leaders in this direction.

Irradiation has steadily advanced as one of the best ways to treat cancer, but it is only a tool and, like all tools, the results which are to be obtained with it depend upon the knowledge and skill of the one who uses it. Today irradiation stands on an equal footing with surgery and is actually superior to it in dealing with cancer in certain parts of the body.

Medical Treatment.

The medical cure of cancer remains where it was a year ago, when the discussion of this subject by a special section of the International Cancer Conference at London furnished the only disappointment of the meeting. Up to the present no medicine or drug or serum or vaccine suitable for general use and capable of curing cancer has been recognized by the medical profession. Only surgery or X-rays or radium in their established forms and combinations should be depended on.

The methods of treating cancer by irradiation which are universally regarded as best have been brought to their present state by a comparatively few individuals and institutions. Last year the League of Nations asked some of the foremost authorities to compare their methods and draw up a report giving detailed instructions to cover the procedures which they considered best. This has been done, and a report was issued last June which is of great value.

The Cancer Commission of the League of Nations is composed of eminent scientists from England, France, Germany, Switzerland, Italy, Holland and Japan. It attracted much notice two years ago by publishing a statistical report which showed that the cancer mortality in certain parts of the body was quite different in different countries without any reason for it being apparent.

On July 24 last the House of Commons voted about $500,000 to equal the same amount raised by popular subscription with the assistance of the Thanksgiving Fund for the King's recovery, the intention being to purchase twenty grams of radium to be used chiefly for the treatment of cancer. The quantity previously in the country has been estimated at about twenty-six grams. The popular subscription was raised in record time. On April 29 The London Times published a strong appeal for contributions and within ten days about $900,000 had been given.

A Radium Trust has been established, with a royal charter, to hold this money and be responsible for the ownership of the radium, and a commission has been set up for its care and utilization. It is intended that portions of the radium shall be allocated, under appropriate regulations, to institutions which are qualified to use it, but that the actual ownership and ultimate control shall always be vested in Parliament.

How to make the best skill and ability available to all who so sorely need it is the greatest practical problem which is connected with the war against cancer at the present time. Apparently the solution does not lie in making the diagnosis and treatment of cancer a specialty in medicine, as some have proposed. The subject is too complicated and calls for exceptional knowledge and skill in too many directions for that.

A plan which is being followed in some hospitals with good results is the formation of groups, each member of which is expert in some particular branch of the work to be done. A group should contain a pathologist, a general surgeon, a radiotherapist and an internist. If possible there should be specialists in the various branches of surgery, as gynecology, laryngology, &c.

There is need, also, of special equipment. Not only must there be provision for surgery but for X-ray photographs, the therapeutic applications of X-rays and radium, and the keeping of suitable records. In other words, what is required is a cancer clinic or a cancer hospital. We have some already, but there are not nearly enough. It would be a good thing if every general hospital of 200 beds or more had a cancer clinic.

It must not be supposed from what has been said that every case of cancer requires the combined attention of a whole group of experts. There are many cases numerically, although they form a small proportion of all, which occur on the surface, can readily be recognized and can be successfully treated by every surgeon or radiotherapist. It is the obscure and insidious cases, and particularly those which involve internal structures, which call for expert treatment. These happen to be the ones which most often occur.

Some Organized Efforts.

The laboratory, clinic and hospital facilities which are now available for cancer patients are rarely adequate in any city. Let us glance for a moment at the efforts which are being made to supply this deficiency in the various parts of the world.

In France anti-cancer centres have been established in all parts of the country, and they now number fourteen. The law under which they function provides that each centre shall contain facilities for treating the sick, for conducting research, and for the instruction of medical students. They are all under the control of the government and receive a part of their support from it. Following this example, a number of other countries have also established centres.

In England there are special cancer hospitals, and wings and wards of many general hospitals are devoted to cancer. London has the oldest institution in which special provision is made for cancer (Middlesex Hospital) and also one of the newest. The new one is called the Marie Curie Hospital and was established by the London Association of the Medical Women's Federation.

In Germany there are four anti-cancer centres.

In Sweden there is an institute devoted to cancer which has a world-wide reputation. The Radiumhemmet has done more to develop scientific radiotherapy as a means of curing cancer than almost any other institution in the world. Patients who cannot pay for treatment are brought to it from all parts of the country at the government's expense.

Once a patient at this place, a person is never lost sight of thereafter. For the rest of his life his health is a matter of concern to the institution. This system of follow-up, as it is called, is being followed elsewhere, not only for philanthropic reasons but as a means of ascertaining and insuring the completeness of the cure. Cancer sometimes has a way of reappearing after all signs of it have been removed.

The War Abroad.

So great is the appreciation of the value of radiotherapy in Sweden that the King has returned $1,000,000—raised by popular subscription for him on his seventieth birthday—to the people to increase the existing facilities for cancer treatment.

In Italy, among other efforts, there has been opened a special cancer hospital at Milan. Some of the money to pay for it was subscribed by business houses and the Mayor took an active part in the undertaking.

Belgium has a number of cancer centres and a fine new cancer hospital is just being completed at Louvain. Each centre has at least two grams of radium.

The United States is not behind other countries in the prosecution of cancer research or in hospitals devoted to cancer, so far as the total number is concerned or the high quality of the work which is done at the best of them. There are not nearly enough provisions, however, for the large number of patients who need special skill and care.

There is not nearly enough radium in the United States. The government has done very little to encourage cancer research or to increase, or promote an increase in, the hospital facilities which need to be supplied for the sufferer. Only one State, Massachusetts, has thus far undertaken a rational program against cancer. There are but few cities in which even a serious effort has been made to provide enough hospitals or hospital beds for cancer victims. Most of the patients are treated in surgical wards of general hospitals, and the length of time that they can remain there is often limited. It is limited for the reason that the beds are needed for other kinds of cases which can more certainly and more quickly be made well.

PUTATIVE MOZART MASS.

A HITHERTO unknown mass, tentatively supposed to have been written by Mozart, was recently discovered in Baden, near Vienna, by the director of a church choir. On the title page is a long inscription, ending with "Authore W. Amadeo Mozart." Investigations are now under way, and if the mass proves genuine, it will be performed before the end of the year.

OLD GOEBEN CRUISER IS TO SAIL AGAIN

Reconditioning of the Famous German Ship Is Announced by The Turks

ONE item in the new Turkish naval program is of more than usual interest. Sandwiched between the announcement of an order to Italian shipyards for many warships is the news that the battle cruiser Yawuz Sultan Selim has been reconditioned and will soon be placed in commission.

Reference to "Jane's Fighting Ships" reveals the fact that the Yawuz Sultan Selim is the famous German battle cruiser Goeben, which after a narrow escape from the French and British Mediterranean squadrons in August, 1914, managed to reach the Golden Horn and was sold to Turkey.

Her subsequent rôle in the World War, after Turkey lined up with the Central Powers in the following October, was not at the time recorded by the press—more important events were taking place in the West. But it is now a matter of record that a month after Turkey entered the war, Nov. 18, 1914, the Goeben fought an indecisive action with three Russian pre-dreadnoughts. During this action she was seriously injured by a double mine explosion. It took three months to effect repairs at Stamboul. She was then twice mined in the Black Sea.

In 1917, when scarcely recovered from these injuries, bombs from a British airplane struck her deck during an air raid on Constantinople. In January, 1918, the Goeben and the German cruiser Breslau, which had accompanied her in her flight from the Mediterranean, sank the British monitors Raglan and M-28 at Imbros, but both ships were mined. The Breslau sank and the Goeben was saved by beaching her near Nagara Point, where she remained until the British withdrawal from the Dardanelles zone.

According to comparative records, the Goeben has probably survived more attacks than any ship engaged in the war, at the end of which she was little more than a wreck. Her bottom had two large holes, all but two of her twenty-four boilers were out of commission and there were two large rents in her deck.

She lay on the shore near Nagara Point until early in 1927, when under a contract with the French Chantiers de St. Nazaire, which had been signed in the preceding December, the ship was removed to Ismid for reconditioning.

The Goeben was laid down at Hamburg in April, 1909, under the 1909 German program as a sister ship to the Moltke.

The eighteenth annual appeal for the Hundred Neediest Cases is made today.

BYRD TROD A LONG ROAD TO FAME

Accident at Annapolis Nearly Led to His Being Retired Before the War

Then, prophetically, he could not stand it any longer.

"Mother, I want to go around the world," he said.

Mrs. Byrd was aghast. You would have to be the mother of a 12-year-old boy and living in a small town far from the sea to know the nature of her astonishment.

Then, as now, Dick quietly announced his intentions. Remonstrance did not move him. Picture him at 12: just a child, overly serious and almost fragile in his slenderness; his handsome little oval face thin-lipped and drawn with eager determination.

In that July, 1902, Dick set forth to circumnavigate the globe. I doubt if he had an equal thrill when, nearly a quarter of a century later, he hopped off for the North Pole. The trip to San Francisco was without incident. Across the Pacific he saw his first typhoon. Through the Indian Ocean and Suez he saw the romance of the Far East. On his return he was met at the Battery in New York by twenty reporters. Some of the same reporters met him in 1927 after his flight to France!

He had had his first taste of high adventure. He had learned the matchless zest of searching the distant corners of the globe, skirting foreign shores and meeting strange races of men. But his half-formed boyish character resisted the temptation to keep on. He knew in a vague way that one must learn a lot in order to get full measure of delight from travel.

Leads a School Rising.

With the same eagerness that he had voyaged he now set out on ten years of heavy schooling. He became a student at the Virginia Military Institute, noted for its stern routine. Undismayed by the austerity of its masters, he led a mutiny directed against what he considered inadequate rations in the school mess. That he and his fellow-conspirators came through unpunished, that the menus were improved, testifies to the righteousness of the cause as well as to the sound judgment of the young crusader.

In 1908 he entered Annapolis. The writer of this article was then a first-class man at the same institution. We remember meeting the new "plebe" from Virginia. We remember being attracted to him even then. It was not his looks, though they were comely enough. He had curly close-cropped hair, fine regular features and sharp eyes. But there was something more than we could see. He had personality. It was made up of a thousand things—looks, bearing, expression, size, color, carriage, voice. They combined to give him personal magnetism. It was a fine charm that made men want to know him. He still has it.

At Annapolis Dick was a crack boxer, played quarterback on the varsity team (breaking his leg in a Navy-Princeton game) and captained the gym squad. In scholarship he was of the upper crust. Then, just as he was about to graduate with high honors, disaster overtook him: he again shattered the bones of one leg by a bad fall in the gymnasium.

It looked for months as if his career were ended. He got behind in his studies. The doctors feared that he would be a cripple for life. When the leg finally healed it had to be operated on and wired together.

Dragged down by despair and pain, Dick Byrd turned to his books. Night after night he lay in his hospital bed and studied. On graduation day he walked to the platform with an almost imperceptible limp and received his diploma with his class. He had won one of the hardest battles of his life.

At sea, an officer of the battleship fleet, he learned the fundamentals of strategy and tactics, excelled in gunnery and was known as an excellent navigator. Twice he worked his way through tropical jungles and forded malarial rivers with his bluejackets, putting down native rebellions—one in Nicaragua and one in the island of Haiti. He twice jumped overboard and saved men from drowning, once in a heavy sea when a weaker swimmer would have drowned.

Then once more disaster confronted him, as it had when he neared graduation. America was about to enter the World War and every young man of spirit wanted to get into it. But in 1916 the navy surgeons had told Byrd that his broken leg was still not properly healed—never would be, in fact. Therefore he must retire.

He asked for aviation. "I can sit down in a plane," he explained.

Success in the Air.

Byrd insisted on a month's trial; made the grade; became a student flier. He took his course at Pensacola. Twice he had crashes; once a head-on collision. But he stuck to it. Curiously, some people think he is not an expert pilot. Yet he was the first navy man to fly out of sight of land and test new theories of air navigation.

Because he was supposed still to be a lame duck, he was not sent across, but put in command of a small aviation unit outside of Halifax—a heart-breaking disappointment. While at Halifax he went ahead with plans for a scheme that had been boiling inside of him since 1914. This was to cross the Atlantic Ocean by air. He thought that if he could accomplish that feat an air trip to the North Pole would logically follow.

But the Navy Department made the best of his ideas and organized a group of three planes to make the Atlantic flight by way of the Azores. Byrd went part way on one and then saw Commander Read succeed in the NC-4. He asked then to be allowed to try a non-stop flight from New York to Paris. Theodore Roosevelt dissuaded him because engines were still unreliable.

As a sop to the young flier's ambition he was sent to England in 1924 to join the British dirigible R-32, which was to cross the Atlantic westward. By a hair Byrd failed to get aboard on her last trip. The ill-fated dirigible exploded over the Humber and her crew was lost.

Read's success and the R-32 catastrophe dampened all interest in ocean flights for the time being. In 1925 Byrd turned to his other plan, that of conquering the Arctic by air, and got permission to take three navy planes to Greenland. He had been warned against taking an airplane to the Far North. His men were not familiar with Arctic conditions. He himself had not been North.

Exploring in the Arctic.

These handicaps were great. Ice and storm brought even greater ones. But August, 1925, found him basing his little ship on Etah, North Greenland, from which he flew over 6,000 miles of glaciers and mountains and sea ice.

On his return he at once announced his intention of flying to the North Pole. Despite his success in Greenland, experts were unanimous in their efforts to stop him from what they termed a "foolhardy stunt." But on May 9, 1926, he took off from King's Bay, Spitsbergen, with Floyd Bennett in a tri-motored monoplane and headed north.

The take-off itself was a triumphant climax after many difficulties and disappointments. There had been trouble getting a proper ship. Finances had failed just before the sailing. There was no dock or landing place at King's Bay. The harbor was full of ice. The one plane had to be ferried ashore in a blizzard. Amundsen came in with the Norge, also bound for the Pole. The plane's skis were twice smashed on attempted take-offs.

"Honestly, we couldn't believe we were at last under way!" exclaimed Byrd later in his boyish fashion.

The flight was not without its thrills. Near the Pole one engine began to leak oil. A forced landing on the rough ice would probably have meant the death of both men. But Byrd would not turn back, now that he was near his goal.

He had left his base soon after midnight, flying in the blue light of the Arctic sun. He circled the Pole about 9 o'clock the next morning, then swung on the homeward course. His sextant fell off its table and was broken. Had he not had years of experience in navigation he still might have disappeared as Amundsen was destined to disappear a few years later. But after sixteen and a half hours of roaring flight the plane slid down to her base in a cloud of powdery snow, while the Norwegians as well as the Americans shouted their applause.

Byrd returned home a hero. But the blaze of enthusiasm with which he was greeted did not divert him from his course. He at once set out on an arduous lecture tour to raise money for his transatlantic flight. Rodman Wanamaker helped him to buy a plane.

In the Spring of 1927 there were six entries in the "Transatlantic Derby." By the end of April Byrd was nearly ready. An aviator from the West, Charles Lindbergh, had been scarcely heard of. Then, as has so often happened in Byrd's life, bad luck overtook him. His plane had not yet been accepted. Anthony Fokker, the designer, took him and Bennett up in a test flight. The plane proved nose-heavy and rolled over on landing, badly damaging the nose and engines and injuring Bennett so seriously that he was permanently put out of the enterprise.

This gave Lindbergh his chance—and he won. But Byrd soon followed, only to be cursed with outrageous weather conditions that brought him down in a forced landing on the coast of France after nearly fifty hours in the air, against Lindbergh's thirty-three and a half hours.

Followed the oppressive grind of another international greeting that occupied many weeks. And then the preparations for the air attack on the South Pole. He got away in the Fall of 1928 after a siege of work that would have cracked a less wiry and self-contained man.

At the South Pole.

Byrd made his base on the edge of the vast lifeless ice barrier that surrounds the southern axis of our globe. He efficiently laid out food depots to cover his retreat in case he was forced to walk back after his South Polar flight. He discovered new land and hitherto unseen mountain ranges. Then when the time was ripe he made his latest brilliant flight to the South Pole and back to his base. His achievements may have no immediate commercial value. But in their contribution to the abstract sum of total human knowledge they cannot be evaluated.

One can be little more than categorical in sketching a career so varied as Byrd's. Moreover, he is not a man to dwell upon his troubles. Toil to him is a matter of course; disappointment an intrinsic part of life. But the more one knows the man the more one perceives the basic truth his career illuminates: the truth that success is almost never a "meteoric rise," but very slow plodding achievement, fraught with travail. Very methodically Byrd has advanced toward his present position as the leading air explorer of the world. In his youth and during his many years in the active line of the navy, even while he was engaged in most obscure activities, he was advancing step by step in the direction of his fame.

It is too great a temptation not to add that thus we can never tell in our plodding existence when we are doing things that will ultimately be highly important not only to our own welfare and success but to the welfare of those who shall come after us. FITZHUGH GREEN.

BOUDOIR FASHIONS HELP SOLVE THE CHRISTMAS PROBLEM

ALL THINGS TO ALL WOMEN

The New Lingerie and Negligees Offer Fascinating Gift Suggestions

THE lingerie and negligée department in every shop has constituted itself first aid to Santa Claus, to judge by the throngs of eager shoppers in these environs anxiously consulting their Christmas lists. For the woman of leisure who entertains much at home there is the smart "studio dress" or the luxurious hostess gown. The tired business woman knows that one relaxes much better in a lovely negligée than in a dingy bath robe. Every school and college girl expects at least half a dozen pajama sets beneath the Christmas tree. For one who is inclined to be a trifle chilly, what gift more appropriate than one of those new lace-knit jackets, or Shetland knit robes, in delicate pastel tones? And for any and every woman, old or young, the new underwear, whether it be the tailored type of chiffon glove silk or more feminine trifles in crêpe or satin lavishly trimmed with lace, makes a gift which will certainly bring real joy to the recipient.

From England by way of Paris comes the vogue for the tea gown, the studio robe or the formal lounging pajama. Women of a more leisurely attitude toward life than ours have long appreciated the part which these becoming garments play in the wardrobe, and so enchanting are the new models that American women have eagerly adopted them, even though, in order to wear them, it is occasionally necessary to remain at home.

Tea Gown in Ivory White

A REALLY royal gift is such an exquisite tea gown as the one sketched, from Louiseboulanger. It is of ivory white satin, lavishly trimmed with cream-colored Alençon lace, and follows the lines of formal frocks in its fitted bodice, peplum draperies and long trailing skirts. Equally charming is a pajama ensemble from Lelong, in which trousers and peplum blouse of green satin are matched to a full-skirted coat of velvet, bordered with mole. Vionnet interprets this mode with a characteristically graceful tea-gown pajama of flat crêpe and velvet, the flowing pleated sleeves of the tuck-in blouse matching the pleated trousers which fall like a skirt to the ankles. From Alexandre comes a formal negligée of flame-colored chiffon, on princess lines, the back appliquéd with the same material in sunburst effect, the skirt ending in a train and the sleeves loose and flowing.

Excellent for one who travels much are the Vionnet pajamas sketched, which have full trousers of claret-colored crêpe satin and a slip-on overblouse of beige satin with border and sash of the red and reversible scarf in beige and wine color. This garment does not muss, may be adjusted in a moment and is as practical as it is smart. More suited to the boudoir are the pale green satin pajamas, with elaborate trimming of beige lace, whose lines suggest a Russian costume. The unusual blouse, bordered with the lace, buttons high at the neck, and the three-quarter coat and wide trousers also have deep pointed borders of Alençon. A most frivolous and feminine costume!

Youthful Pajamas

THE younger set will appreciate those charming sleeping pajamas designed by Chanel, in pale pink satin, the sleeveless blouse and trousers finished with an appliquéd scalloped border hemstitched on, and having a narrow sash belt. For lounging there are numerous suits which combine pajamas of plain satin in black, white or pastel tints with three-quarter crêpe de chine coats, embroidered or hand-blocked in striking designs. These coats may be worn as separate negligées. Very amusing is a lounge suit in gay calico patchwork effect in brilliant color, with a sleeveless tuck-in blouse of bright red flat crêpe. Popular also with the school and college set are the flat crêpe pajama ensembles, which simulate gingham checks in blue, red or green.

The new lingerie offers much that is of interest to women. Colors were never so lovely, fabrics so luxurious, designs so becoming.

Ultra-modern is a nightgown illustrated, from Annek, which combines tea-rose satin with the same shade of chiffon and which follows the princess lines of a smart dinner frock. The yoke and circular side sections are of the chiffon, while the body of the robe is of satin. A matching princess chemise may be had with this gown.

Enter More Satin

SATIN, high in favor abroad for underthings, has become popular in this country because of its soft and supple quality, which makes it excellent for wear under the new clinging frocks. Ivory white and French pink are the leading colors, which are usually seen in combination with beige Alençon lace. Slips, chemises and nightgowns follow the new princess lines, the slip and chemise being backless for evening wear. Nightgowns frequently have belts and show skirts with circular godets, or pleated side sections, shorter in the front, and sometimes they descend in a train at the back. A very attractive new fashion is the matching of the nightdress to a short bed-jacket or "matinee," which transforms the costume into a negligée.

Ninon is another favorite French fabric and combines the sheer delicacy of chiffon with excellent wearing and laundering qualities. It comes in white and all the pastel colorings, and also in charming printed designs, with quaint little buds or nosegays scattered over a border of flesh, blue or yellow. Garments of the printed ninon are usually cut on the simplest lines, with hand-rolled straps and bindings of a contrasting color for the only decorations.

Crêpe de chine, of course, is a classic for lingerie, but this year one sees it embellished with quantities of the finest convent embroidery, which was formerly reserved for the garment of batiste or handkerchief linen. From Italy come some exceptionally attractive night dresses in peach, almond green, flesh and pale yellow, with embroidered yokes in fine Italian appliqué embroidery which suggests shadow work. These possess the merits of laundering beautifully and of being comparatively inexpensive and lovely enough to appeal to the most fastidious.

Uses of Lace

PARIS frequently combines handwork with real Valenciennes or Alençon lace in crêpe de chine sets of slip, chemise and night dress. One such set in pale shrimp pink has a naïve design of garlands of daisies set close together upon a background embroidered in tiny dots. A narrow edging of real Valenciennes is used for a finish and the hand-pleated night dress is cut longer at the back, with a belt tied at the high waistline.

Not content with being a mere trimming, lace is now being employed to make entire garments for evening wear. Ivory and deep cream laces, bordering on the beige tints, are preferred and the lace, while sheer and delicate, has sufficient body to hold its shape. A princess chemise of lace is cut with the low evening back and flares from a fitted yoke. Mary Nowitsky makes a dance set of step-ins and bandeau of deep cream Alençon on which she appliqués huge roses of hand-painted chiffon in vivid colors.

Glove-silk underwear, for the woman who still remains faithful to simplicity and tailored lines in lingerie, shows many interesting details in line with the present more feminine mode. A sheer, chiffon-like fabric which wears amazingly well has been developed in glove silk and comes in white, ivory, pale beige, flesh and peach. The new garments are cut on princess lines, sometimes having slender panels outlined with narrow pipings in contrasting shade.

A Charming Example of the Elaborate Tea Gowns Sponsored by Paris Is This Model From Louiseboulanger, in Ivory Satin, Lavishly Trimmed With Beige Alençon Lace, and Having a Fitted Bodice and Long Trailing Skirts. This Is Suitable for Informal Dinner Wear.

AMONG THE LUXURIES

Tiny Travel Clocks and Watches Are Real Objets d'Art.

SOME people, especially women, resent the idea of a "useful" Christmas present, furnishing for "the house," or something that would necessarily be provided anyway, but novelties somewhat in this line are being offered that will make acceptable gifts to any one, even though they may be serviceable as well. These are diminutive clocks either to stand on the dressing table, to be worn or carried. One of unusual beauty forms the pendant on a brooch of long, graceful flower design, set with baguette diamonds. The face of the pendant is all of the jewels, a tiny watch forming the back.

Many other less splendid and less costly ornaments that hold somewhere in their architecture a tiny but reliable watch are to be had in the new styles of precious and semi-precious stones and enamel. A miniature clock appears on the tower of a church in a European village, painted on porcelain, with the figure of a Cupid hammering arrows on his anvil. The colors on this trifle are particularly lovely, and the paintings show various picturesque scenes.

Gold watches the shape of a nut covered with leather are attached to a short leather strap. These are easy to slip into the pocket or bag. Little snap watches the size of a postage stamp are enclosed in enameled cases to carry in one's purse.

Styles in Fans

NO woman is likely to regret the gift of one of the new fans which are among the accessories that have come in with a more stately style of dress. The lace fans are unusually lovely and of fine quality. One is of black Chantilly on slender sticks of tortoise shell of unique shape, much longer in the middle. A fan of white chantilly is mounted on amber sticks, and several exquisite models are of rose point on sticks of mother-of-pearl.

Fans of stiffened maline—introduced two years ago—are shown in new forms, like large blossoms, in delicate shades to harmonize with evening gowns. Small, exquisitely dainty fans, that suggest the Watteau period are painted on gauze, and others flash and glisten, with the surface covered with spangles caught with a single thread. An up-to-date ensemble in accessories is a fan of black velvet matching a very small muff designed by Jean Patou, and a number of the new fans are made of velvet in different colors.

SCENTS EXOTIC OR NAIVE

There Is One for Every Costume and for Every Hour of the Day

PERFUME has become an important feature among the accessories of dress, and the custom of Paris houses in offering perfume along with their new models is now general among the exclusive modistes as well as the shops in New York. Individuality in "scent," as the English say, is a fine point in the wardrobe of women of fashion, and this year is emphasized in the great variety of perfumes offered in attractive forms. Certainly there is no more alluring gift for Christmas.

One New York house is selling fascinating Christmas boxes done up in silver paper and tied with silver cord, with a cluster of flowers on the top—a gardenia and a spray of mignonette, a tea rose, a sprig of heliotrope and a rose geranium leaf. In this collection are three distinctive perfumes, one for daytime that blends the odors of fifty garden blossoms, another that is distilled to ally with afternoon dress and a third that is an evening perfume, exotic, delicate and luxurious. They are shown in artistically designed bottles, quite simple, but of clear crystal with an ornamental stopper.

Lucien Lelong, who is one of the most prominent parfumeurs of Paris, makes every one of his scents an interpretation of the person for whom it is intended. They are specially distilled and become the essential fragrance of the type and each is to serve with a particular one of his gowns.

In his ambitious scheme he has made three distinctive and delightful perfumes, which he designates simply as A, B and C. A is to be the climax of the evening toilette and has the glamourous appeal that is associated with the long, sheer evening gown of fluid lines. B, fresh and fragrant, is meant to perfume faintly afternoon dress for the open in the South, and C belongs to a naïve girlish frock for any occasion. One more, which the originator marks "N," seems to belong to any style of dress and time of day and responds most definitely to costumes of the more sophisticated type.

One of the New Short Negligées in Flesh-Colored Velvet.

All of these perfumes come in dainty crystal bottles, most attractively though simply turned out, usually in little cases that contain one of each.

A golden coronet surmounting ornate, encrusted bottles is the mark of a sumptuous assortment of perfumes inspired by the Duchess of York. Two of these scents are already known from previous seasons, one a luxuriant bouquet of flowers, the other a flower-scented incense. To these are added this season one in which the odor of lilacs predominates, and an Oriental perfume.

These are to be had in containers of three sizes, the perfumes being so distilled that just a tiny drop is sufficient to give to one's handkerchief, lingerie or gown a faint, delicious odor. In addition to the perfumes there are toilet waters tinted in flower shades, and other waters with which to perfume the bath. One most refreshing is a pine needle water.

Lentheric of Paris is making some charming perfumes which are exotic in the extreme and include the scents that are used for daytime and evening. They are a subtle combination of the Oriental and the fresh, flowery scents of the Occidental, and are made also into delightfully fresh toilet waters. All of these are put up in bottles of crystal, amber and aquamarine tinted glass with a line of colored glass imitating rubies, sapphires and emeralds outlining the edges and set into the stoppers. These perfumes are to be had in pretty leather cases that hold two or three bottles and make very acceptable gifts.

FOR HER STOCKINGS

Miniature Cabinets That Hold Hose For All Occasions.

FOR the gift which is at once smart and practical there is no better choice than one of the new hosiery cabinets, arranged to hold half a dozen or more pairs of stockings. In one of these convenient little novelties there is a place for the hose to wear with one's tweeds, one's more formal street and afternoon costume and one's evening frock, and it is possible to find the desired shade at a moment's notice.

Some of these miniature cupboards are quite elaborate, made of painted wood and lined with glazed paper or figured chintz to match the appointments of the closet. Others are merely square boxes divided off into compartments and designed to fit in a corner of the bureau drawer.

In planning such a gift it is well to include the four leading hosiery shades of the Winter, for the recipient is certain to find these colors acceptable and in harmony with her wardrobe.

Daytime stockings are decidedly darker, for the break in the silhouette caused by light stockings is no longer desirable. There are three important colors in this group. A warm cocoa shade leads for sports, for it is designed to harmonize with the browns, beiges and tawny shades which prevail in tweeds. For street wear a dark brown hose in chiffon weight is very good, for it may be worn with the costume of black, brown, green or red and is equally smart with shoes of black or brown.

Taupe Has a Vogue

FOR the all-black street or afternoon ensemble the preferred shade is taupe, with a slight brown cast, giving the effect of very sheer gunmetal. This shade was sponsored by the leading couturiers with their midseason and afternoon costumes in black.

For evening, a very pale suntan—a clear, delicate amber tint—is the most popular. It gives the effect of a skin tone, but with none of the pinkish cast shown in former seasons, and harmonizes with the black, white, pastel or printed frock. Some of these evening stockings in cobweb texture show shadowy hand-wrought French clocks.

For the woman who likes the novel and different there are stockings in coarse fishnet and jacquard weaves in all the season's approved colorings, which may be included in such a gift.

The eighteenth annual appeal for the Hundred Neediest Cases is made today.

FROM THE PARIS DESIGNERS

Intimate Fashions Show Result of the Present Revolution in the Mode

PARIS.

LINGERIE has had its own style revolution, following the lead of costume fashions. Negligées outtrail the most sweeping evening gown, and even pajamas sometimes slither along the floor in back. Chemises, and nightgowns no less, have become princess in silhouette and wear their waistlines high.

Naturally all daytime lingerie must, perforce, be cut on similar lines to the frock under which it is to be worn, so that the princess chemise is no surprise. So comfortable and beautiful are these fitted garments that one wonders why they were not adopted long ago. Madeleine Vionnet, who even before the princess vogue cut her smart undergarments thus, has some of the most beautiful of the new chemises, which she flares below the hips if they are to be worn with full-skirted dresses, or gives a tailored slenderness if they are to be worn with street clothes.

Annek, whose lingerie is designed by Lady Abdy, shows princess slips for wear under evening gowns, with the hemline cut exactly like that of the gown. They are, of course, shorter than the dress, but are considerably below the knees at that. These slips are made of pale pink chiffon and encrusted with bands of pink crêpe satin. One of the prettiest of them dips in a circle at the back.

An Annek nightgown, cut princess, is made of pale yellow triple voile and has a yoke of pale yellow crêpe satin and crossed diagonal bands below of the same material. This gown looks like a medieval dress, with its long skirt gathered full at the hipline on the sides, and is something new and delightful. Pink chiffon under fine all-over lace is used in a princess chemise from this house, with four godets to flare the skirt and a narrow ribbon lacing at the top to hold it close to the body.

For Stylish Lounging

PAJAMAS and negligées suitable for Christmas gifts are shown in some smart new models. Madeleine Vionnet shows pajamas for lounging, with trousers that are about the length of the smart daytime skirt. These trousers are very wide, but cut in one piece with the blouse. A wide, draped girdle of contrasting satin is placed at a high waistline and the pajama coat matches the girdle.

Vionnet makes her pajama coats with a cutaway closing and dips the hem in back. Lanvin is showing striking princess negligées of silk crêpe with very wide sleeves embroidered in silver petals, and with skirts that are flared below the hips in circular panels. Louiseboulanger's tailored negligées, with fitted cutaway coats of lamé which have very full chiffon skirts attached to the bottom, are novel and as beautiful in line as her evening frocks.

Hand-knitted negligées in pastel shades are seen in the shops, and are excellent for practical wear. Crêpe de chine and chiffon are still the favored materials for negligées, while most couturiers prefer to make their lounging pajamas of satin, with coats of lamé or velvet. White satin pajamas worn with coats of black velvet are seen in most important collections, and emphasize the wide scope of the black-and-white vogue in women's fashions.

Pajamas for Sleeping

WORTH has some very feminine sleeping pajamas made of tigressa, a thin georgette flecked with white. These have long trousers banded with lace, and with fitted hip yokes, and bloused, lace-trimmed waists, with small turn-over collars. This house prefers lace to trim nightdresses, which are empire in line, with low flares on princess foundations, and yokes at the top that recall the tiny waist of the empire period.

Jeanne Lanvin shows house gowns that are much more practical than the usual negligée and quite as charming. They have blouses with wide sleeves cut in one piece with the waist and made of nasturtium-colored crêpe romain. The skirts, ankle-length, are gored and flared quite low, and made of a lighter shade of crêpe romain. Around the waistline, which is high, is a girdle of rhinestone-embroidered ribbon.

LITTLE DORRIT'S CHURCH IS IN DANGER OF RUIN

Old Edifice Immortalized by Dickens Is Cracking Badly From Jars of Near-by Traffic and Funds Are Sought for Repairs—Its Many Links With History

LONDON.

"LITTLE DORRIT'S Church," or the Church of St. George the Martyr, which was immortalized by Charles Dickens in one of the most famous of his novels, is in danger. Recently ominous cracks appeared in its crypt and side walls, and it became evident that this celebrated church, situated in the grimy London district of Southwark and nearly 200 years old, might collapse entirely unless it was strengthened. Since then a certain amount of repair work has been done, but, unless it becomes possible to do a good deal more, the church's condition will remain precarious.

St. George's figures largely in "Little Dorrit." It was there that the "Child of the Marshalsea Prison," one of Dickens's most appealing characters, was christened and there, in the vestry, that she slept, with a burial register for her pillow, after the dreary night in the London streets that she called her "party." And there in St. George's it was, too, that Little Dorrit eventually was married—to the lover whose mother this pathetic scrap of humanity had worked for as seamstress.

"Then they went up the steps of the neighboring St. George's Church," the story of the wedding goes, "and went up to the altar, where Daniel Doyce was waiting in his paternal character. And thus was Little Dorrit's old friend, who had * * * given her the Burial Register for a pillow: full of admiration that she should come back to them to be married after all.

"And they were married, with the sun shining on them through the painted figure of our Saviour on the window. And they went into the very room Little Dorrit had slumbered after her party, to sign the Marriage Register."

The Jars of a Big City.

Past St. George's roars the heavy traffic of Borough High Street and beneath ramble the trains of London's subway, and, thus ceaselessly shaken and jarred for many years, both the tower and the walls of the church have been showing signs of dangerous weakness. Previously, too, the floor of the vestry had become rotten and the ceiling threatened to come down, it having been more than thirty years since anything was done to the inside of the church.

Experts estimated that to repair the damage and generally put the building in order would cost $25,000, but the church has a congregation composed mainly of the very poor. The rector, the Rev. Edward Neep, wrote letters to 700 firms and private individuals inviting them to contribute—and got $85!

Later an appeal to the public on behalf of the church was made by the Mayor of Southwark and others, including Henry Fielding Dickens, K. C., youngest son of the novelist, who also has contributed to the fund. The result of this appeal has been donations amounting to about $7,500, leaving an additional $17,500 urgently needed.

"The moment the money runs out I shall stop all repair work," the rector declares, "and the scaffolding will come down, for I refuse to run into debt. Naturally I am very worried."

From all over the world thousands of people come every year to see "Little Dorrit's Church." About all that most of them know concerning it in advance is that it is the church immortalized by Dickens. So it is with the more surprise that they discover that it is, also, historically one of the outstanding churches in this country.

It occupies the oldest parochial site in London. Its predecessor, similarly named, had been standing there for at least six centuries—the only fact known positively about its date is that it existed in 1122, a bare 56 years after the landing of William the Conqueror. Archaeologists of many periods have speculated as to the age of this church and agreed that it probably was built before the Norman conquest.

What is certain is that in 1122 one Thomas Arden, upon whose ancestor the parish had been bestowed by the Conqueror, gave the church to the abbot and monks of Bermondsey. This was, of course, a Roman Catholic order, and in its hands the church remained until the Reformation, when it was taken over by the Crown.

It was at this old Church of St. George the Martyr that, in 1389, Richard II, having determined to remit a fine of £100,000 that he had imposed on the city of London, was publicly received by the Bishop of London, all the clergy and 500 choristers. The streets through which the King passed were lined with the city Companies in order, it is recorded, and the conduits ran wine and the people shouted in acclamation. About a century later we find both Henry VII and his Queen contributing to the funds of St. George's.

In one of Hogarth's pictures—"Southwark Fair" amidst the hubbub of the fair and the booths, the top of the square and embattled tower of old St. George's Church can be seen. People are seen on it engaged in the sports of the fair, watching and helping a mountebank in his flight down a rope from the tower to the ground.

In those half-lawless times St. George the Martyr Church was one of the recognized places of sanctuary in which wrongdoers fleeing for their lives from summary justice or summary revenge, could take refuge and be safe from pursuit. There is a true story of one particularly despicable scoundrel obtaining sanctuary in St. George's. This was a brute who, adopted and brought up by a kindly widow, murdered her one night and carried off her money and jewels. When at last he reached St. George's Church, he let it be known that he was willing to confess his crime publicly, to swear that he would leave the realm and, taking a cross in his hand as a token of what he was, set out to go to an appointed port to take ship for France. Retribution came, however, for while he was being conducted along the way the women of Southwark covered him with mud and filth and presently slew him out of hand.

The Old Graveyard.

The famous Marshalsea Prison, where Little Dorrit's father was confined as a penniless debtor, and where she herself was born, stood midway between St. George's Church and London Bridge; and it was customary for many years to bury in the church's graveyard prisoners who died in the Marshalsea. This was how it came about that the notorious and infamous Bishop Bonner, the persecutor of Queen Mary's reign, was buried there in September, 1569.

This ancient church having undergone many repairs, and being "in a ruinous condition," the parishioners, in 1733, got leave from Parliament to pull it down and erect another. The present church was begun in 1734 and finished in about two years, the cost being met by a grant of $30,000 out of funds appropriated for building fifty new churches in London and the vicinity.

"GOING NUTTING" IN AUTUMN IS ON WANE IN NEW ENGLAND

Acorns for Food and Missiles Do Not Appeal to Our Youth as They Did a Generation Ago

THAT good old-fashioned New England custom of "going nutting" in the Fall of the year does not mean so much to the present generation of boys, but their fathers who are given to retrospection will recall many joyous occasions.

From thirty-five to fifty years ago, youth found no such diversity of pleasures as it finds today. Recreations were not so strenuous and were sought along simpler, more natural lines. Long hikes through fields and forest were favorite Saturday outings. Nutting parties were in great favor. In Maine and New Hampshire oak trees abounded and during October and November no boy was a "regular fellow" unless his pockets bulged with acorns.

The bitter acorns were prized as missiles for what the youngsters called "slings," or "sling shots." A few designated them for what they really were, "crotches." Rivalry was keen as to who should possess the most powerful and accurate weapon. These crotches were cut from good sized bushes or tree limbs where two prongs branched evenly and of about the same size from the main stem. Handles were left five inches long and the two forks about the same.

At the village harness shop a scrap of leather was obtained from which an elliptical-shaped piece about three inches long was cut. A small hole was punched in either end and one in the centre. Pieces of stout, round, elastic cord about a foot long were run through the end holes and knotted to prevent them from slipping through. Then the free ends of elastic were tied smoothly to the prongs of the crotch. The pointed end of a bitter acorn was placed in the centre hole of the leather. This acorn was held in place by thumb and forefinger of the left hand while the right grasped the handle of the weapon.

When the "nut-bullet" was pulled back as far as the stretching elastic permitted and then suddenly released, it carried for surprising distances. Many of those boys of an earlier day acquired great proficiency with these primitive weapons. Even an occasional squirrel was brought down and in rare cases a partridge was stunned and captured. Youngsters of sharp-shooting skill sometimes demonstrated their accuracy of aim on the window panes of old deserted farm houses when nobody was present to restrain them.

Sweet acorns, about half the size of the bitter variety, were fine to eat and held in great esteem. They were not nearly so numerous as the bitter acorns, but trees that bore abundantly were known to the boys and visited every Fall. Old pillow slips were surreptitiously borrowed from linen drawers and used as bags. It was no great task for three or four live youngsters to fill one of these containers on a Saturday afternoon.

Sweet acorns eaten raw were very palatable and had a flavor all their own. They were also excellent roasted like chestnuts. Plenty of bitter acorns may be found in New England countrysides this Fall, but the sweet acorn trees are indeed few and far between. Men of today who were boys in those halcyon nutting days will recall the superstitious practice of carrying two or three bitter acorns in the trousers pocket as a specific against rheumatism.

THORNLESS BERRIES.

ATTEMPTS to develop blackberries and dewberries without thorns are now being made by the United States Department of Agriculture and at various State experiment stations. Recent reports indicate that the efforts are meeting with success.

NEW OIL SAND FOUND IN CANADA

FEARS that oil reserves will exhaust themselves continue to be checked by new strikes, discoveries and economic processes. In Alberta, at Edmonton, an experimental plant has successfully extracted from Athabasca River bituminous sands by simple cream-separator methods the material for naphtha, fuel and lubricating oil, kerosene, gasoline and asphalt.

Using the centrifuge patented by W. C. Laughlin of New York, the operators dump in raw sand, the machine whirls and throws out first water, then clean sand, then a black stream of hydrocarbons. One ton of sand yields thirty-two gallons of the viscous liquid, and The Edmonton Journal reports that the refinery extracts from "every barrel 13 gallons of gasoline, 6 gallons of lubricating oil and 110 to 150 pounds of asphalt."

The cost of production of each barrel of hydrocarbons is placed by the company at 50 cents. Present machinery can handle 70 tons of sand daily, yielding 70 barrels of hydrocarbons. The plan is to erect at McMurray next Summer a plant of 500-barrel capacity.

The eighteenth annual appeal for the Hundred Neediest Cases is made today.

HOOVER USES THE NATION'S TALENT

The President Has Sought Men of Experience For Commissions Appointed by Him to Consider Problems of Government

PRESIDENT HOOVER'S confidence in the value of commissions to meet the technical problems of government was indicated again recently by his desire to have business and industry establish a council with the purpose of safeguarding the country's economic development. The business or economic council will be formed by industrial leaders to carry out the program of stabilization discussed at numerous conferences recently held at the White House, with the President as the moving spirit.

Since he took office nine months ago President Hoover has brought into the public service men of experience and influence, many of them without political affiliations, to serve on commissions appointed by him to consider problems in various fields of government, and suggested besides, in his recent message to Congress, that several others be authorized, among them a shipping board, a power commission and a commission to Haiti which would investigate the advisability of removing the marines from that island. The commissions and boards he has already appointed are:

The Yellowstone National Park Boundary Commission, the Veterans Commission, the San Francisco Bridge Commission, the Farm Board, the Commission on Law Observance and Enforcement, the Child Welfare Planning Committee, the Commission on the Conservation and Management of the Public Domain and the Advisory Committee on National Illiteracy.

Park, Veteran and Bridge Questions.

On April 8 the President named the members of the Yellowstone National Park Boundary Commission, which had been authorized by Congress on Feb. 28, a few days before he took office. This commission was requested to investigate the advisability first of extending the Yellowstone National Park so that it would include part of the Teton National Forest and second of permitting the Bechler River basin, in the southwestern corner of the present park, to be developed as a reservoir which would supply water for irrigating farms in Eastern Idaho.

The rugged, forest-covered mountains in the Teton National Forest, which it is proposed to include in the park, would be a notable addition; however, since hunting and trapping are allowed in the National Forest but not in the National Park, their inclusion would mean the further restriction of territory in which hunting and trapping are permitted. To settle these difficult problems, President Hoover appointed a commission of five men. Two are well known for their interest in the conservation of wild life, one is an authority on water power and irrigation, another is a landscape architect and the last an expert on forest resources.

President Hoover next appointed a commission to coordinate the activities of the various boards and associations devoted to helping war veterans. The Army and Navy Departments, the Pension Bureau and the Veterans Bureau were all working separately to assist ex-service men and there was necessarily a large amount of duplication and waste, as well as conflicting claims of authority. He therefore selected, after a preliminary investigation in May, another commission of five men: Secretary of the Interior Wilbur, Brig. Gen. Frank T. Hines, director of the Veterans Bureau; General George H. Wood, president of the board of managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers; Walter H. Newton, secretary to the President, and Lieut. Col. C. B. Hodges, military aid to the President.

To determine whether a bridge across San Francisco Bay would impair the defense of the harbor in case of war, as some persons asserted, the President next authorized a commission of two army engineers, Colonel George B. Pillsbury and Major Edmund L. Daley, to make a study of the situation and report the facts to him.

Farm Board and Crime Committee.

In his message to the Congress which he had called in special session on April 17, President Hoover strongly urged the creation of a Farm Board as the best means of relieving the farmer and it was largely through his recommendation and influence that this commission came into being on June 15. Under the leadership of Alexander Legge, chairman of the board, an attempt is being made to improve the condition of the farmer by encouraging the formation of cooperative organizations and insuring them against loss through price declines with the aid of the $500,000,000 revolving fund appropriated for the board.

Probably the best known of the Hoover commissions is the Commission on Law Observance and Enforcement. The President had discussed in his inaugural address the lack of honest respect for the law which he had observed throughout the country, and had said then that he proposed to appoint a commission to investigate the failure of law enforcement and the shortcomings of judicial procedure. On May 20, after several weeks of consideration, as to its possible membership, he gave the list of names to the press. Ten well-known lawyers and one woman educator, Ada L. Comstock, had accepted places on the board, which was headed by George W. Wickersham. The commission was generally praised for the high calibre of its members who, it was agreed, would not be influenced by prejudices or their own interests.

The members in pursuing their purpose first asked all the organized bodies interested in law enforcement to submit what data they had available on the subject of lawlessness and law enforcement. They soon learned how meagre and unreliable was the information already at hand and therefore resolved themselves into eleven groups, each of which is gathering the statistics on one of the following subjects: causes of crime, crime and criminal justice, police, prosecution, courts, criminal institutions, probation and parole, juvenile delinquency, criminal justice and the foreign born, lawlessness by government enforcing officers and the cost of crime.

Public Lands and Illiteracy.

President Hoover did not appoint a commission on child welfare, but it was at his invitation that the planning committee for the third child welfare conference held its first meeting in the Cabinet room on July 29 to discuss with him plans for the conference. Under his direction the planning committee is preparing what Secretary Wilbur, who is chairman of the conference, has called "the most sweeping study of child welfare that has ever been made in the world." The results of this study will be reported to the child welfare conference when it meets at Washington next year.

On Aug. 28 in a letter to Joseph M. Dixon, Assistant Secretary of the Interior, which was read at a conference of Governors of public land States, the President outlined his proposal for transferring to the States about 200,000,000 acres of public lands and announced his intention to appoint a commission so that, as he said, "these matters may be gone into exhaustively and that I may be advised intelligently." On Oct. 17 it was announced that James R. Garfield, a son of the former President, had accepted the chairmanship of the President's Commission on the Conservation and Management of the Public Domain, which held its first meeting on Nov. 23 and discussed the problem with the President.

On Nov. 16 President Hoover sanctioned an Advisory Committee on National Illiteracy which Secretary Wilbur will direct in a campaign to gather the facts about illiteracy in the United States. The commission will attempt to determine what percentage of illiteracy is caused by lack of opportunity and what percentage by mental handicaps and will make the first extensive study since the World War, when statistics on the literacy of the soldiers were gathered.

NEW LIGHT ON LEPROSY HERE FOUND IN A FEDERAL SURVEY

Institution at Carville, La., Thirty-five Years Old, Reveals Peculiarities of Disease

THE National Leprosarium at Carville, La., celebrated the thirty-fifth anniversary of its establishment on Dec. 1. For twenty-seven years it was maintained by the State of Louisiana; then the Federal Government bought it and took over its operation. The following year it was filled to capacity and new construction was undertaken. Now it is caring for almost 300 patients. More than 700 have been treated there altogether.

This number is not a measure of all the leprosy that has existed in the United States in the last thirty-five years, for patients are still being admitted in all stages of advancement of the disease, but a statistical study of the inmates there, which traces the course of the disease in this country, has recently been made by Dr. Ralph Hopkins and Dr. Oswald E. Denney of the institution.

Contrary to a widely current idea, leprosy in the United States is not an affliction particularly of the foreign-born nor even of any one grade of the population. It respects neither caste nor creed. Lepers have come to Carville from as many as 115 different occupations and from every walk of life as regards education, wealth and culture. Many were born in foreign countries, but the great majority, in fact more than five hundred, were born in this country. One-half the total of the foreign-born came from Mexico, China, Italy, Greece and the Philippine Islands, but forty-three countries have been represented, including such northerly ones as Finland and Canada.

Only twelve of the States of the Union have made no contributions of cases. Most of the lepers came to Carville from Louisiana, California, New York, Texas and Florida. In the last few years so many natives of Louisiana, Florida, Texas and Mississippi have been admitted that the disease is thought to be endemic in these States.

It is assumed that leprosy is not indigenous in others, since of the patients they have sent comparatively few have been native-born. Many States have sent only sporadic cases. A racial study made for the State of Louisiana alone reveals that in consideration of the make-up of the population the incidence of leprosy among the whites has been more than twice that among the negroes.

Of the cases that have been handled by the leprosarium, almost three-quarters have been males. The ages of new cases admitted have ranged from one year and a half to 83 years. The average age has been 36.

A study made of a number of family trees in Louisiana shows clearly that the disease has been passed on through succeeding generations, with the almost complete extinction of some of the affected branches. In four families associated by marriage or contact twenty-one cases developed; in three generations of one family there were fourteen cases; in three generations of another family there were thirteen. Drs. Hopkins and Denney conclude that "leprosy is a disease that is transmitted through prolonged and intimate contact in conjunction with other not well understood factors."

It may take as many as six or seven years after infection for the disease to manifest itself. For example, in 1895 five sisters were admitted to the Louisiana Lepers Home. One of these had adopted a child in whose family was no known leprosy and who, after her foster mother went to the hospital, was taken into another non-related family where there was no leprosy. It was seven years before she showed any symptoms, but she finally died of leprosy at the home. The mother of these five sisters also died of leprosy, but it was not known that she had the disease until six years after her daughters had gone to the hospital, and meantime she had had no other contact with it.

The average duration of leprosy between the appearance of the symptoms and death, as observed at Carville, is approximately fourteen years. At one time it was thought that leprosy was inevitably fatal. During the first ten years of the institution's history not a single patient was discharged. It was assumed that they had come to Carville to die. Now it has become evident that the disease, if not curable, may be sufficiently arrested for its victims to go about normally without endangering other people. Forty-eight patients were discharged during the last fourteen years of operation of the leprosarium by the State, although ten of these suffered relapses and had to be readmitted.

More stringent regulations governing discharge were then promulgated; and since the Federal Government has been in charge, twenty-eight have been sent away cured, with only one relapse. Each patient in the leprosarium must be examined bacterioscopically at least once in twelve months. Those who show no symptoms at this examination must be examined once a month for eighteen months, then subjected to a critical physical examination. If this is passed satisfactorily, the patient is sent home on parole, subject to reexamination every six months for three years, at the end of which time he may be permanently discharged.

BRAZIL'S COFFEE CENTRE GROWS OTHER CROPS TO ADD TO INCOME

ALTHOUGH Sao Paulo, Brazil, is still the centre of the world's coffee industry, it is becoming less and less dependent upon coffee as a source of income, and is turning more to other industries to permit the development of its great variety of resources and to maintain a balance that does not leave business linked to the fortunes of a single crop. As a consequence, coffee, which has so long provided the capital for the development of the State, now contributes only one-third to the total value of its products.

Corn, rice beans, cotton and sugar are produced in great quantities in this section of the Republic. Bananas have found a growing market in Argentina; and it is planned to organize the plantations on the coast and to provide up-to-date transport facilities in order to compete in the European and North American markets.

Efforts are being made to build up an export trade in oranges, lemons, pears, pineapples and grapefruit. It has been found that a greater profit can be obtained by planting orange trees on long-used coffee lands than from coffee itself, and that it is better to begin new coffee plantations in virgin areas. A modern packing house, equipped with machinery from the United States, has been erected at Limeira.

The growing of wheat in the lowlands of Sao Paulo is being encouraged. Farmers are induced to rotate wheat, corn and other crops, and to grow wheat between young coffee trees. Corn, rice and other crops not harmful to the trees are now raised to some extent. Land under wheat cultivation has shown great increase in recent years.

Another occupation that has attracted the attention and cooperation of the State is the fishing industry, which is well organized under the direction of the State fisheries service. A school is maintained at Guaruja, near Santos, under the State, and it inspects all fish shipped to the modern and hygenic storehouses.

NOVEL HOT DOG STANDS

INGENUITY in service is being called into play by refreshment stand designers. Believing the common "roadside rest" needed further attraction, one designer has placed his stand on an automobile to serve his customers "on the run." Another frankfurter stand has been opened in a postoffice in West Barrington, R. I. The postmaster sought to please people waiting for mail, many of whom apparently develop appetites waiting for delivery. A "seagoing" stand is reported to have made its appearance on a lake near Wabash, Ind.

SALE OF CHRISTMAS SEALS TO AID HEALTH EDUCATION

Money Received Will Support for a Year Tuberculosis and Health Association

WHEN the total contributions from the annual Christmas seal sale have been received, they will assure the life and activity of the New York Tuberculosis and Health Association for another year. The association, according to Harry L. Hopkins, director, functions departmentally under eight committee heads, all devoted not only to the relief of those already suffering from disease, but also to the education of the public in health matters.

"Education is the strongest defense against disease," says Mr. Hopkins. "The experience and testimony of the medical profession have proved that a large percentage of sickness is preventable. To teach the public to know themselves as human beings, to teach them the real nature and danger of disease, in place of superstitious ideas about it, is the most effective means of saving human lives."

To this end the association offers a direct personal service in its health information bureau which reaches 15,000,000 people yearly, providing diagnosis for disease, information as to personal care, and a placement service in institutions for those requiring it. This is a service largely limited to those who are already sick.

A far broader scope of appeal is that of the Health Education Bureau which, in the past six or seven years, has associated nearly every health organization in the entire city in the common cause. Working through this alliance, it controls and provides much of the health education and discussion which reaches the public of New York through lectures, motion picture films, puppet shows and all other vehicles of oral and visual information. The field of this bureau is wide, including public and private schools, universities, settlement houses, churches, clubs for adults and young boys and girls, social groups and medical groups in hospitals.

"The second committee under the association's banner is the children's committee," says Mr. Hopkins, "which gives Summer vacations, dental care and medical advice to approximately 18,000 children a year.

"Our industrial service provides expert advice to large industrial concerns in a work the importance of which cannot be overestimated—early diagnosis of tuberculosis. Tuberculosis, we must remember, can be cured when discovered in time and infection can be arrested among coworkers and members of the family. Tuberculosis strikes hardest among those of working age, when they are supporters of families. This diagnosis work among working people is one of our chief efforts in the battle against disease. When necessary, this industrial service committee also finds sanatorium cure for patients. At the present time it is serving more than 75,000 employes of New York industrial institutions."

Investigation on the part of the New York Tuberculosis and Health Association reveals that one out of every five inhabitants of this city is dependent upon the clinic and dispensary service which is provided at many points throughout New York.

MIAMI

Healthiest Spot in America is Ready to Entertain You

In tropical Florida where health-giving sunshine prevails 360 days in the year, you will find endless delight in many days of enjoyment while bitter cold enwraps the North. And health too—Dr. C. F. Roche addressing Southern Medical Association convention says in effect that Miami's bright sunshine and pure air cure bodily ills. Its milder climate is conducive to longer life and robust health. Golf, tennis, polo, horse racing, greyhound racing, deep sea fishing, speed boating, every sport possible in summer is found in Miami all winter long. Spend the winter months under the sun, renew strength and health, gain a new zest in life. The city controlled plan of season rentals permits you to have most reasonably your choice of living quarters. Miami's hotels set a standard for the country. Direct travel lines reach Miami by motor, air, rail and water—all of them fast and luxurious. THE TIME OF YOUR LIFE THIS WINTER IN THE TROPICS' HEALTHFUL SUNSHINE

HAVANA
SMARTEST CITY IN AMERICA

If you've been accustomed to wintering in Europe you'll find you've sacrificed none of the glamour by deciding, this year, to visit Havana. The Riviera . . . Monte Carlo . . . Paris . . . Madrid . . . all find expression in Cuba's decidedly foreign, cosmopolitan, interesting, gay and sophisticated atmosphere. Yet Cuba is only two hours from Miami by air . . . overnight by train and steamship, or two nights out from New York. If you've always spent the winter in the United States, then here is a new and broadening experience that you'll never forget! Something new to do every minute of the day and evening! Much to see and study in the native architecture, music, art and customs. New health and comfort in Cuba's perpetual sunshine, with the added safety of knowing that you can keep constantly and economically in touch with your business, if necessary, by telephone or return quickly if the need should arise. Every conceivable sport and pastime is provided for. Here is the logical vacation for this day of changing business conditions and quick moves in industry. It is the sensible solution to the problem of gaining all the benefits of a warm southern winter, foreign atmosphere and complete recreation without the penalty of being too far from home or incurring excessive expense.

ALL EXPENSES

Two vacations in one! Gorgeous, restful days at sea on a luxurious Savannah Liner. Interesting, colorful days ashore, amid scenes as historic and romantic as ever Hollywood produced.

Board a Savannah Liner in New York any Monday, Wednesday, or Friday. Enjoy the perfect rest and relaxation of an ocean voyage. Revel in a luxury of service and cuisine not excelled on the finest transatlantic liner. Bridge, dance and play deck games. Mingle in the carefree, informal social life of shipboard.

Enjoy true Southern hospitality and that world-famous Southern cookery as our guest at the Hotel DeSoto in Savannah. See the sights of old Savannah—a living, breathing picture of Dixie "befo' de wah." If you find Savannah so delightful that you just can't leave it—your time ashore may be extended at the same reasonable rates.

Where in all the world will you find a vacation more delightful—or less expensive. For information or reservations ask or write any tourist agency or OCEAN STEAMSHIP CO. of SAVANNAH, New Pier 46, North River; or Suite 206, 551 Fifth Avenue, New York.

BERMUDA

A Bit of Britain

HOW can Bermuda be described? No pen could paint the blue-green-violet of its waters, or that first impression of white cameo houses set against the rolling hills. No symphony could be as eloquent as its silence unbroken by the roar of autos and factories. And how can words convey the kick in a picnic party behind a spanking pair of geldings? Or the thrill of being on a bike again . . . of diving into breakers tinted like bursting bubbles . . . of golfing, sailing or dancing the Tropic night away in charming British Colonial company? Only forty-eight glorious hours away, all this, with three regular sailings weekly—M. S. Bermuda on Saturdays, S. S. Fort Victoria on Wednesdays and S. S. Arcadian (commencing January 2) on Thursdays.*

THE FRANCONIA WORLD CRUISE

Sailing from New York January 11

The thrill of striking contrasts

The urge to see more...to know more...the great thrill of world conquest. The pride, the enchantment of discovery; to roam the bazaars and the fairs of strange exotic lands and capture their gay wares for your very own. Tiger-skins in India...star-sapphires in Ceylon ...gold and silver thread sarongs in Java, in China, mandarin coats...precious jades in Korea...exquisite cloisonné in Japan.

A remarkable itinerary—ports never before visited by any world cruise—Amoy, Malacca, Pasuruan, Surabaya. On the ship that has the cruising viewpoint built into her—that has the largest swimming pool—the largest sport arena in the field of cruising steamers. 138 pleasure-packed days—the prestige and efficiency of two world-famed travel exponents with their 177 years of experience.

THE CHILD LABOR PROGRAM WIDENS

National Committee, Rounding Out a Quarter Century of Protective Effort, Seeks to Extend Its Beneficent Activities

By DIANA RICE.

THE board of trustees of the National Child Labor Committee has issued invitations for the twenty-fifth anniversary conference on Dec. 16 and 17 at the Hotel Roosevelt. Speakers at the conference meetings will include men and women who for a quarter century have sponsored laws for the protection of young children once all too commonly exploited for commercial ends. Dr. Felix Adler, first chairman of the organization, whose first meeting was held in Carnegie Hall on April 15, 1904, will preside at the anniversary dinner on Dec. 16. If his public duties permit, Governor Roosevelt will speak on the function of government in child protection.

The history of the National Child Labor Committee is, to a large extent, the history of child protection in this country. Today few States permit the employment of children under 14 years of age, but twenty-five years ago such employment was common enough. Then, educational and health requirements for young workers were just beginning to be widely discussed. Night work for children was being abolished, although there were still isolated cases.

In Mines and Mills.

Many States as yet had no age limit for child workers; other States did not forbid 12-year-olds working a certain number of hours each day provided they had put in a "few" hours at school. Compulsory school attendance laws were not at that time in force in all States. Children of 7 worked in some places without fear of the truant officer's warrant or civic interference.

One of the first evils on which the committee turned its spotlight was child labor in textile mills and coal mines. Expert investigators gathered facts first-hand from mills and factories—findings that were turned into reports published by the committee for the enlightenment of a hitherto uninformed public. The "breaker" boy and young mule driver in the coal mines of Pennsylvania and West Virginia and underage laborers in the glass factories of New Jersey and Ohio became familiar through pictures and stories in the newspapers and magazines. Children in oyster and shrimp canneries added their testimony to records accumulated by the committee at its headquarters in New York, and it was also disclosed how the juvenile street vendor, messenger boy, "newsy" and bootblack plied their trades unrestricted on crowded city streets.

Early Relief Measures.

For two decades dramatic chapters were written about the children employed in beet fields, mills, factories and mines, and the small boy picking cotton in the South or onions in the North. But as the health of the small boys who were to be the country's future citizens began to concern employers, parents and teachers, local societies followed the lead of the National Child Labor Committee in investigating working conditions among America's youth.

From the beginning the committee strove to create an informed public opinion that would in turn force the enactment of measures of relief. Its first chairman stressed the wisdom of keeping the committee conservative rather than radical, and of demanding action but not pressing for something the public was not yet ready to give. And slowly that public opened its mind to information contained in tracts and pamphlets, reports and records, written by educators, medical authorities and social experts. A closed chapter in the country's history was translated through the medium of the National Child Labor Committee. Leaders in many fields of thought for the first time turned their attention to the children working in dingy shops and unhealthy factories.

Starting the Movement.

When this committee began its investigations, the disciplinary value of work for children not yet in their teens was generally accepted by both parents and employers. The philanthropic boss who employed child labor and gave liberally to charity was applauded. There were many customs and prejudices for the committee to overthrow before its early efforts could be turned into a constructive program of relief. As important local bodies appealed to the committee for assistance in specific problems, new converts were made to the movement. In its issue of May, 1905, the American Academy of Political and Social Science printed a symposium on child labor. In the same year, Dr. Adler appealed for the observance of a Child Labor Sunday, an observance that is still considered an effective means of informing the public of child labor problems yet unsolved.

In 1906 the committee sponsored a Federal investigation into labor conditions among women and children. This investigation, whose findings were published in 1910, was so important a contribution that it is generally acknowledged to have hastened the establishment of the Children's Bureau in Washington. Miss Grace Abbott, present chief of the bureau, will be one of the speakers at the anniversary dinner.

Legislation to control child labor has been a slow growth. While two Federal child labor bills have failed to pass, much progress has been made by the various States in the supervision and control of juvenile employment. Practically all States at present regulate hours of work, and some States do not permit a child under 16 to be employed in gainful occupation. The majority of States have an eight-hour day for children under 16, and the restriction of night work is general.

Educational and health requirements are no longer treated lightly. Twenty-six States require a physician's examination and certificate of physical fitness before a child of 14 can go to work. Other States, while not insisting on such a certificate, leave the matter to the discretion of the officer issuing work permits. Thirty-one States now require the completion of the sixth grade before a child of 14 can leave school and take a job. Employers have found that ignorance and bad health make poor workmen and result in a heavy turnover loss, and they no longer take on juvenile help indiscriminately.

In its 1930 book of facts, the National Child Labor Committee has compiled several comprehensive tables of employment data. While complete figures for the number of children at work are not available for the last quarter of a century, the United States census for 1920 shows that the reduction in the number employed has been impressive. Between 1900 and 1920 the percentage of children engaged in gainful employment, from 10 to 15 years of age inclusive, dropped from 18.2 to 8.5.

The figures disclose that by far the largest number of children were employed in agricultural pursuits. In 1920, children in agriculture numbered 647,309; in manufacturing and mechanical industries, 185,337; in clerical occupations, 80,140; in trade, 63,368; in domestic and personal service, 54,003; in transportation, 18,912; in extraction of minerals, 7,191; in professional service, 3,465; in public service, 1,130. The total of children gainfully employed in the United States is put at 1,060,858.

The Situation Today.

Despite progress made, loopholes still exist, according to committee members, whereby children under 14 can work in factories. Nor do several States enforce health and educational standards for children entering industry. Two States have no general wage minimum and have exemption clauses in their compulsory attendance laws that permit children under 14 to work during school hours. Eight States specify a daily working period of from 9 to 11 hours, a 60-hour week not being prohibited.

As twenty-five years ago the committee based its program on facts disclosed through personal investigation of existing evils, it continues today to base its program on the present needs of child in industry. Assistance through constructive education rather than through legislative restriction will, it is believed by the committee, bring the best results. Through the medium of facts and figures the National Child Labor Committee will continue to tell the story of the young child and his first job. Specific questions of continuation schools, cooperative classes, methods of apprenticeship and of accident prevention are included in the new and broader program with which the committee will inaugurate its second quarter century. Samuel McCune Lindsay, Professor of Social Legislation at Columbia University, who is the committee's present chairman, will open the first session of the anniversary conference.

The eighteenth annual appeal for the Hundred Neediest Cases is made today.

DIEGEL KEEPS TITLE BY BEATING FARRELL

Wins by 6 and 4 in Final of P. G. A. Championship at Los Angeles.

2 STYMIES PROVE COSTLY

Turning Point Comes When Farrell Knocks Rival's Ball in Cup on 27th and 28th.

MATCH EVEN UP TO THEN

Loser Sinks 57-Foot Putt on 17th and Ends First Round 1 Up on Champion.

Special to The New York Times.

LOS ANGELES, Dec. 7.—The national professional golf championship was won by Leo Diegel of Agua Caliente, Mexico, for the second year in succession at the Hillcrest Country Club today when he defeated Johnny Farrell of New York by 6 and 4 in the final round of the P. G. A. tournament.

The match hung in the balance for three-quarters of the scheduled distance. Farrell was 1 down on the twenty-seventh green, with a putt to square the match. He was partially stymied, and in attempting to putt out Johnny knocked Diegel's ball into the cup. That gave Diegel the hole, and Farrell turned for home 2 down.

This setback was duplicated on the twenty-eighth green, when Farrell stymied himself and again bumped Diegel's ball into the cup to give his opponent another hole. That made the Quaker Ridge pro 3 down, with 8 to go. The twenty-ninth was halved, both missing putts for 4s. The end came quickly after that, for Diegel won three holes in succession, the last two with well-placed birdies.

Valiant Fight by Farrell.

The two stymies on successive greens, which proved to be the turning point, ended a valiant fight on Farrell's part. Johnny finished the morning round 1 up after he had been 4 down on the first six holes played. Neither scored well on the morning round, an outstanding fault in the play of both being failure to get up on short pitch shots.

On several occasions after Farrell had put his second shot on the green many feet short of the pin, Diegel followed his example. Their approach putting from long distances was excellent, and on the morning round Farrell holed two long putts, one of fifty-seven feet, to win holes. Farrell's fifty-seven-foot putt squared the match on the seventeenth green.

Diegel's outgoing card in the afternoon showed a 34, although he actually took thirty-five shots, the difference being due to the incident on the twenty-seventh hole. Farrell took 38 to go out, his chief errors being two short approaches, one tee shot off line and the disastrous putt on the twenty-seventh.

Joins Exclusive Group.

In successfully defending his title Diegel joins three other golfers—Jim Barnes, Gene Sarazen and Walter Hagen—in winning the P. G. A. crown two years in succession. In his triumph here this week Diegel duplicated his feat of last year in defeating Sarazen and Hagen on successive days.

The match today was followed by a gallery of 4,000, which included many celebrities of the stage and screen, as well as persons prominent in the sports world in games other than golf.

After halving the first four holes in the morning, Farrell lost four in a row, two as a result of wild tee shots, one through a weak approach, which led to three putts and another to a birdie. Johnny then won three holes in a row, one by a putt of ten feet, the eighth by a fine recovery from a trap and the ninth by a 30-foot putt.

Squares Match on 17th.

Chipping too far cost Farrell the eleventh and put him 2 down again, but he won the twelfth by a great niblick pitch from hard, bare ground and he squared the match on the seventeenth by holing a tremendous uphill putt that was paced off as measuring fifty-seven feet. The New Yorker then went to luncheon 1 up when Diegel missed his tee shot on the eighteenth.

Diegel squared the match by a superior approach on the first hole of the afternoon round and he went to 1 up on the twenty-second green, where he holed a short putt for a birdie after Farrell had missed one slightly longer. Diegel was trapped on his approach to the twenty-third green, squaring the match again, but the champion's straighter drive on the long one-shot twenty-fourth hole put him 1 up once more. The next was halved and then came the decisive stymies on the twenty-seventh and twenty-eighth greens.

Winning the short thirtieth with a 5 made Diegel 4 up and he scored spectacular birdies on the thirty-first and thirty-second to end the match.

Following is a hole by hole description:

MORNING ROUND.

No. 1, 360 Yards, Par 4.

Farrell's pitched approach landed on the green fifty feet short of the pin. Diegel was about twenty feet from the pin. Johnny laid his approach putt up and after holding a two-footer for a 4, conceded a half to Diegel, whose shorter approach putt had stopped close by the hole. Match even.

No. 2, 166 Yards, Par 3.

Both reached the elevated green with well-hit irons, Diegel being twenty-five feet from the pin, and Farrell fifteen feet. Farrell's bold try for a birdie ran three feet over.

In a desperate, wild-riding finish before a crowd of nearly 17,000, Franco Georgetti and Gerard Debaets rode to victory in Madison Square Garden last night in the forty-seventh international six-day bike race. The Italian-Belgian pair stole a lap in the final hour and that was its margin of triumph.

Freddy Spencer and Franz Deulberg made a furious bid to gain the lap that would have given them a last-minute triumph, but the great riding of Georgetti and his partner made their efforts futile. Second place was their award, while the gallant little French Red Devils, Alfred Letourner and Paul Brocardo, finished the grind in third place. Jimmy Walthour and Norman Hill were fourth, this kid pair coming from behind in the last two days to become contenders. Reggie McNamara and Gaetano Belloni finished fifth.

Fast Riding by Spencer.

Spencer's flashy riding in the last two minutes of the race drew a tremendous cheer from the same spectators who had booed him so heartily throughout the week. But no team, not even the winners, drew anything approaching the ovation accorded Letourner and Brocardo when, arm in arm, they pedaled slowly around the track. Showers of papers fell on the track about the shoulders of the Red Devils and the crowd roared throughout their circuit of the track.

The French pedalers, who had finished second five times previously in such races, had more supporters in the crowd than any combination riding, and it was well-deserved support for their clean, game work throughout the week.

Georgetti and Debaets never seemed seriously threatened after they had gone out to lap the field and draw away from a first-place tie with the Frenchmen, their stamina and consistent speed making it almost certain that no pair on the track could pass them again. The effort of Spencer and Deulberg, if successful, would have given them the victory, even though tied in distance, as they had piled up a total of 651 points to 505 for the winners.

Horder and Linari Sixth.

Horder and Linari were sixth; Richili and Rieger, seventh, and Beckman and Winter eighth and

CLARY GOES OVER TWICE

Runs 25 Yards for 2d Touchdown After Intercepting Forward Pass in Final Quarter.

By JOSEPH C. NICHOLS.

Special to The New York Times.

BALTIMORE, Dec. 7.—The Western Maryland football team stepped into the class of the gridiron elect today when it defeated the University of Maryland by the score of 12 to 0. The triumph marked the eleventh straight victory of the season for the players from Westminster, who closed their schedule without even a tie to mark their record.

Balmy skies, which strongly belied the murky conditions underfoot, attracted a throng of 22,000 to the struggle, which was waged on a field made uncommonly muddy by the recent thaw. Western Maryland, boasting the stronger and heavier line, profited by the condition to a greater extent than its rival, but was considerably hampered by the mud, none the less.

Neither team showed any inclination to handle the ball any more than was necessary, and kicks were sent back and forth with more than regular frequency. As a result the game developed into a strictly defensive battle, during which there was little opportunity afforded for spectacular dashes.

Clary Furnishes Thrills.

Frank Clary, Western Maryland halfback, provided the greater part of what few thrills were seen. He plunged over the Maryland goal line in the third period for the first score of the game, and intercepted a forward pass in the final quarter to run 25 yards for another touchdown.

Lou Berger, Maryland's ace, loomed as a star at the beginning, when he forced the rivals to keep their distance with consistently long punts. But he was injured in the second period and was forced to withdraw, thus robbing Maryland of one of its most powerful backs.

Although Western Maryland looked stronger from the start, its efforts on the offense were capably smothered until the third period. After the second half opened with one of the kicking duels that prevailed all through the contest Western Maryland took the oval on Maryland's 30-yard line.

Plunges enabled Western Maryland to advance to the 15-yard strip, from where Wellinger tore off a 10-yard end run. Two thrusts brought Western Maryland a foot away from the goal and Clary, on the next play, plunged through for the score. An attempted end run for the extra point was spoiled.

Maryland Off Guard.

Maryland was caught off guard in the final quarter in an effort to draw on even terms with its rival. Two line plunges from its own 23-yard line netted nothing and Maryland resorted to the overhead route, only to meet with disaster.

Evans tried a long forward from a

FLORIDA WINS, 20-6; HEAT HITS OREGON

Eight of Western Players Discard Jerseys During Torrid Intersectional Game.

Special to The New York Times.

MIAMI, Fla., Dec. 7.—Florida's Gators concluded their season here this afternoon, flashing a brilliant running attack in the second and third periods to defeat the University of Oregon 20 to 6 before a crowd of 17,000 who witnessed the intersectional classic in the newly completed Madison Square Garden Stadium.

Clyde Crabtree, versatile Florida quarterback, ended his football career by making an 81-yard broken field run for the first touchdown and the feature play of the game.

Ed Sauls, right halfback, shared in the Florida honors, outdistancing the entire Oregon team to run thirty-two yards and make the second Florida touchdown.

Red McEwen, second string quarter, carried the ball across the goal line to capture Florida's third and final touchdown of the intersectional tilt. McEwen circled around the right end on a fake pass for the score.

Heat Affects Visitors.

It was a hot day for a game and the weather obviously affected Oregon's players. Eight of the Oregon team removed their jerseys as the game progressed and played without the use of the heavy woolen coverings.

Walt Browne, second string flankman, was responsible for Oregon's only tally of the day. On a pass from Wallace Shearer, halfback, the ball bounced out of the hands of Ed Sauls, Florida halfback, and fell into the waiting arms of Browne, who stepped two yards for the goal near the end of the game.

Crabtree was far back in Gator territory on the 10-yard stripe. When he received a punt from John Londahl, Oregon quarterback, Crabtree eluded three Webfeet players who were virtually on top of him, reversed his field, cut around left end, where his interference picked his path, and outstripped the entire Oregon eleven for the first score.

A deceptive kick for the extra point turned out to be a pass from Crabtree to Parnell which registered the added point and gave the Floridians a 7-to-0 lead over the Oregonians early in the second quarter.

Again in the second period the Florida aggregation tallied. Following an exchange of punts which gave the Oregonians the advantage, the

STAMFORD DEFEATS M'KINLEY TECH, 20-12

Conn. Champions Triumph Over District of Columbia Eleven in School Game.

Special to The New York Times.

STAMFORD, Conn., Dec. 7.—Displaying a strong offense, which characterized its play during the recent season, the Stamford High School football team, State interscholastic champions, defeated the McKinley Technical eleven of Washington, 20 to 12, in a hard-fought intersectional post-season clash at Cummings Park today, before a crowd of 5,000.

Previous to this encounter the visiting team triumphed in five of six games played to capture the schoolboy title for the District of Columbia, while Stamford scored eight consecutive victories, losing only the opening game to Middletown High of New York.

With the sole exception of the third period, when the Washington eleven combined a strong offense and defense to tally 6 points and prevent its opponents from scoring, McKinley Tech was outplayed, making six first downs to thirteen for Stamford. Captain Mickey Lione, stellar quarterback for the victors, was the outstanding performer of the contest, consistently reaping large gains through Tech's line, while his accurate throwing of forwards to John Best, fullback, culminated in three touchdowns.

Play Mainly in Midfield.

Play in the initial period was confined mostly to midfield, both teams exchanging possession of the ball as a result of punts, but toward the close of this session a fumbled pass by a Tech player fell into the hands of Nelson, also of McKinley, who ran the ball to Stamford's 2-yard strip with the period coming to a close.

After three attempts to score through the line at the start of the second quarter, the Washington representatives finally tallied when Spencer hurled a pass to Benner, who was standing over the Stamford goal line. Benner's kick for point failed. However, the home outfit came back fast and scored when Lione heaved a 20-yard pass to Best, after Tech lost the ball on downs on its 20-yard strip. A successful dive through centre by Best put Stamford in the lead, 7—6.

Stamford soon followed this with another touchdown, when Lione ran off-tackle for 20 yards shortly after he ran back the kick-off to the visiting eleven's 40-yard strip. Again

GEORGIA CONQUERS GEORGIA TECH, 12-6

Scores in the First and Final Periods to Win in Rain Before 22,000 Fans.

AERIAL HELPS IN 1ST TALLY

Blocked Kick and 50-Yard Run by Bryant Account for the Decisive Touchdown.

Special to The New York Times.

ATHENS, Dec. 7.—Georgia's Bulldogs, pounding and slashing at the Tech line with success and flinging one long pass in the first two minutes of their game with Georgia Tech today, earned an edge which gave them a 12 to 6 victory.

The annual contest between the two ancient foes was watched by 22,000 fans who braved a drizzling rain during part of the game.

Roberts and Waugh put the ball on Tech's 30-yard line. A pass, Chandler to Maffett, went 29 yards and Maffett stepped over the line to score.

After that period, the Yellow Jackets stood up and battled the Bulldogs to a standstill. Tech scored one touchdown early in the third period as its forwards sifted through to block one of Chandler's punts, hurry him on another, and force him to fumble the third, whereupon Holt chased the ball across the goal line and the score was tied.

Georgia came back with another charge, however. Bryant was the hero. Slushing through to block Mizell's kick in midfield and race 50 yards with the ball to cross the double line.

Georgia Scores First.

At the outset Mizell kicked off for Tech, and the Bulldogs, taking the ball on their own 25-yard line, advanced 5 yards on the return. After several gains through the line, Chandler passed the ball to Maffett who was downed on the one-yard line. Maffett then crashed through for a touchdown. Smith failed to pick the extra point.

A short punting duel followed, with the Bulldogs getting a slight edge as Leathers sped down the field to ground Chandler's effort on the Tech 10-yard stripe. Georgia then attacked Tech's line in midfield with little success. The air was also tried. Tech took the ball on downs on its own 22-yard line.

Here the Tech launched its first offensive threat. Tech marched steadily to the Georgia 10-yard stripe, where Thomason, driving through centre for some 6 yards, fumbled. The ball bounded back to Georgia's 11-yard line, where Maffett recovered.

Tech Wages Aerial Drive.

Chandler punted to midfield and Tech started back, taking to the air, however, and Downes intercepted a pass intended for Jones on his own 28-yard line. The quarter ended here.

The second quarter found both teams fighting desperately with honors about even.

In the third period both teams played carefully, and the usual dash and dare of the Bulldogs shown against N. Y. U. and Alabama were missing. Whenever possible both

M'EVER TAKES LEAD AS TENNESSEE WINS

Passes Hinkle of Bucknell by 130-128 in National Scoring by Making 33 Points.

FINAL COUNT IS 54 TO 0

Victors Tally in All but Second Period, to Crush South Carolina in Final Game.

By The Associated Press.

KNOXVILLE, Tenn., Dec. 7.—Tennessee's touchdown twins, Hackman and McEver, ran riot in the mud of Watkins Field today to smother South Carolina under a 54 to 0 score.

McEver, Tennessee's leading point maker, added 33 points to his season's total with five touchdowns and 3 points. McEver's orgy of scoring gave him a total of 130 points for the season, putting him in first place in the national intercollegiate scoring race, two points ahead of Hinkle of Bucknell.

Hinkle on Thanksgiving Day tallied 59 points in his team's crushing victory over Dickinson to pass Marsters of Dartmouth, who had led most of the season. The Dartmouth star was injured in the Yale game and forced out of the race with a total of 108 points.

Hackman contributed three touchdowns on runs of 60, 38 and 50 yards. Only in the second period when the Volunteers' high powered back field gave way to reserves did the Gamecocks check the Tennessee touchdown parade.

McEver scored two touchdowns in the first period, one on a 65-yard return of a punt. Hackman also contributed his 60-yard run in that period. The second was scoreless but in the final half Tennessee ran riot.

Tennessee by its victory closed a ten-game schedule with an unbeaten record of nine triumphs and a 6 to 6 tie with Kentucky. The only team in the Southern Conference to match this mark is Tulane, which closed its campaign with a record of nine straight victories.

Tennessee Starts on Kick-Off.

Tennessee opened with a scoring drive from the kick-off. Ceall kicked to Tennessee's 37-yard line and from there the volunteers' march started, with Hackman and McEver ripping through for steady gains and Bobby Dodd flipping passes to Hearndon to vary the attack. McEver covered the last eight yards in two-line plunges and Dodd passed to Hearndon for the extra point.

South Carolina received and after failure to gain, kicked to Tennessee's 40-yard line, where the ball was grounded. Hackman skipped off right tackle on the next play and scampered sixty yards for a touchdown. Dodd place-kicked the extra point and the score was: Tennessee 14, South Carolina 0.

South Carolina was unable to gain and was forced to punt after receiving the kick-off. In an exchange of punts, McEver took Boineaj's boot on Tennessee's 35-yard line and raced through the entire Gamecock team to a touchdown. Dodd place-kicked the extra point.

Tennessee gained the ball in Gamecock territory on an intercepted pass, only to lose it on the first play as

BIG TEN REFUSES TO REINSTATE IOWA

University's Second Plea Denied After Hearing on Charge of Subsidizing Athletes.

BAN EFFECTIVE ON JAN. 1

Iowa Petition Cites Efforts to Remedy Evils—Admits Some Charges, Denies Others.

FUTURE STATUS IN DOUBT

Athletic Director Uncertain as to Whether Iowa Will Renew Its Application.

By The Associated Press.

CHICAGO, Dec. 7.—The University of Iowa today was definitely barred from Western Conference athletic competition beginning Jan. 1, 1930.

After fourteen hours of discussion, in secret session, the conference faculty committee turned down the Hawkeye petition for reinstatement to good standing and voted to concur in its action of last May by severing all athletic relations with the institution. The decision, in effect, makes the Big Ten become the Big Nine.

In a resolution adopted by the committee it was announced the decision was unanimous, which clearly indicates Iowa did not vote. The committee gave as its reason for refusing to restore Iowa to good standing that the reform within the institution's athletic department had not been sufficiently complete.

No official explanation was made, but it was understood the conference had expected Iowa to disqualify for future athletic competition such star athletes as had been benefited by various "slush funds" by means of subsidy which had been admitted to exist by Iowa officials.

The faculty committee expressed the hope that Iowa at some future date might find itself in a position to renew its petition for reinstatement, thus leaving the door open for the Hawkeyes to make another appeal. The committee usually holds meetings twice a year, one in December and one in May, but may call a special meeting should Iowa decide to make another appeal.

Text of the Resolution.

The committee in its resolution said:

Whereas at its May, 1929, meeting a resolution was adopted by the conference to the effect that beginning with Jan. 1, 1930, athletic relationships with the State University of Iowa shall be discontinued and

Whereas Iowa has now petitioned for the rescission of the May resolution and

Whereas the faculty intercollegiate conference, while definitely of the opinion that Iowa has made earnest and definite steps to correct the evils which led to the May action, is nevertheless of the opinion that there are steps remaining to be taken: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the petition of the State University of Iowa for the present be denied.

It is to be observed that the adoption of the above resolution does not mean that Iowa ceases to be a member of the conference on Jan. 1, 1930. Nor does it mean that Iowa is then suspended. The action means that the resolution of May, 1929, under General Regulation VII of the conference, severing athletic relations with Iowa, effective on Jan. 1, 1930, becomes operative on that date.

It is the earnest hope of the conference that Iowa may find itself in position in the near future to renew its petition.

The nine faculty committee members who voted were Professor Frederic Woodward, Chicago; O. F. Long, Northwestern; J. F. Ampyrye, Wisconsin; James Paige, Minnesota; A. C. Callen, Illinois; William Marshall, Purdue; Ralph Aigler, Michigan; Thomas E. French, Ohio State, and W. J. Moenkhaus, Indiana. Professor Marshal was chairman.

Iowa Officials Are Dismayed.

Dean C. C. Williams, newly appointed chairman of the Iowa athletic council, who presented the petition, and E. H. Lauer, Iowa director athletics, were disappointed and dismayed by their failure to convince the committee that Iowa had "cleaned house," eliminating proselyting, subsidization of athletes, undue alumni control, the existence of "slush funds" and other evils which precipitated the committee's action last May.

Both Dean Williams and Lauer said that until they returned to Iowa City to discuss the situation with President Walter Jessup they could make no definite statement as to what Iowa's future relations with the conference might be or whether another petition would be made.

"What is Iowa going to do now?" Lauer was asked.

"Well, for the immediate future it means a lot of hard work," he replied. "It will be a hard Winter trying to get things straightened around."

Lauer said Iowa had anticipated immediate restoration.

"In fact," he said, "we were so confident of it we did not make any plans for unfavorable eventualities. The verdict went against us primarily because we did not disqualify those players whom the Western Conference aimed at orginially. In other words, everything revolved on eligibility rather than the slush fund, recruiting, proselyting and that sort of thing."

Committee Refuses Comment.

When the decision was reached, the faculty committee members dispersed quickly, refusing to make any comment on their resolution.

"We have nothing to say; the statement speaks for itself," they chorused.

After the decision was announced, coaches of all sports in the conference plunged into the task of framing schedules for 1930 with Iowa out

New England 'Navy' Eleven Beats 'Army' By 14 to 12 as Teams of Stars Clash

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, Mass., Dec. 7.—Arthur Sampson, Tufts football coach, directed his "Navy" team to a 14-to-12 victory over the Joe McKenney, Boston College coach, "Army" eleven before 5,000 in an exhibition football game between New England star college football players at Fenway Park this afternoon.

The "Navy" scored a touchdown soon after the start. Shea of New Hampshire heaved a pretty 30-yard forward pass to Bart McDonough, Dartmouth star, for a touchdown. Ed Jeremiah, another Dartmouth back-field man, drop-kicked successfully for the extra point.

"Army" came back in the second period with a fine forward passing attack led by Cullum of Holycross, which netted two touchdowns and gave "Army" a 12-7 lead.

With about five minutes of play left, Shea produced some splendid forward passes with Jeremiah on the receiving end, and "Navy" finished on top.

Cochet and Hawkes Named Honorary Members Of U. S. L. T. A. by Tennis Committee Here

Henri Cochet of France and John B. Hawkes of Australia yesterday were elected to honorary membership in the United States Lawn Tennis Association at a meeting of the honorary membership committee at the Hotel Vanderbilt.

Cochet was the United States national champion last year and first came to this country with the Davis Cup team in 1926. In 1927 he was a member of the French Davis Cup team which defeated the United States in the challenge round and eventually went on to capture the coveted trophy. Cochet and René Lacoste have been grouped for first place for this year by the French tennis ranking committee, and Cochet is unofficially held by most experts as the greatest tennis player in the game.

Hawkes came here as a member of the Australian Davis Cup team in 1923, facing the United States in the challenge round. He again was a member of the team in 1925 and helped defeat France in the interzone play that year. With Mrs. Kathleen McKane Godfree, Hawkes won the mixed doubles championship at Longwood and was runner-up with Gerald Patterson in the men's national doubles. Last year, paired with Miss Helen Wills, he again won the mixed-doubles and again, paired with Patterson, was runner-up in the men's doubles title play.

The Honorary Membership Committee also decided that Vincent Richards, Wallace F. Johnson, Howard Kinsey and James O. Anderson, who had been elected to honorary membership prior to their turning professional, should despite their present professional status remain on the list of honorary members.

Hornsby Named Most Valuable Player in National League for the Second Time

PLAYER AWARD GOES TO HORNSBY AGAIN

Cub Second Baseman Voted Most Valuable Man in National League in 1929.

VICTOR PRESSED BY O'DOUL

Philly Slugger Lost by Only Six Points, 60-54—Winner's Total Is Lowest in History of Contest.

By The Associated Press.

Rogers Hornsby, slugging second baseman of the pennant-winning Chicago Cubs, has been voted the National League's most valuable player for 1929.

The announcement of his selection by the vote of a baseball writers' committee, of which James Crusinberry of Chicago was chairman, came from the National League offices yesterday. It is the sixth and last official award by the league, carrying with it a bronze medal and a cash prize of $1,000.

Hornsby takes the honor for the second time and is the only player to repeat in either major circuit in this contest, which as a result of criticism of the selections has now been abandoned by both the American and National Leagues. While with the Cardinals in 1925 Hornsby won the award for the first time. He has been a prominent contender every year under the National League regulations, which did not, like the American League, bar former winners.

Although his work was a big disappointment in the world's series, Hornsby's batting and all-around play were considered by most of the writers to have had a big part in the pennant victory of the Cubs. Nevertheless, Hornsby was declared the winner only after a close contest with Frank (Lefty) O'Doul of the Phillies, who won the league batting championship with a mark of .400.

Hornsby Tops Three Lists.

Out of a possible maximum of 80 votes, Hornsby polled 60 and O'Doul 54. Each of eight writers named ten players in the order of value. Hornsby was placed first on three lists, second on two, fourth on one and sixth on another. He was passed up entirely by one expert. O'Doul was accorded two first places, two thirds, one fourth, one sixth and one seventh.

Hornsby's vote was the lowest of any winner in the six official National League contests. Dazzy Vance led with 74 in 1924, Hornsby with 73 in 1925, Bob O'Farrell with 79 in 1926, Paul Waner with 72 in 1927 and Jim Bottomley with 76 in 1928.

Rogers Hornsby, born thirty-three years ago at Winters, Texas, has completed fifteen years of major league play with a lifetime batting mark of .365, surpassed only by Ty Cobb. The Rajah's stormy career has seen him as star second baseman of the St. Louis Cardinals, manager of the world's championship club in 1926, captain of the New York Giants in 1927, manager of the Boston Braves in 1928 and this year second baseman of another pennant winner. He is the highest salaried player in the older circuit.

Averaged .400 Five Years in Row.

Hornsby holds a record of averaging more than .400 for five successive years, 1921 to 1925, inclusive. He has been the league batting champion seven times and except for one year, 1926, when he suffered an injury to his back, always a contender.

The complete vote in the 1929 contest and the honor list:

Hornsby, Chicago	60	Douthit, St. Louis	14
O'Doul, Phila	54	Grimm, Chicago	13
Terry, New York	48	Jackson, New York	8

teams indulged in punting, Chandler for Georgia and Mizell for Tech, with honors about even.

About the middle of the third period Mizell sent the ball over the Georgia goal line. Chandler attempted to punt, but the Tech forwards forced Chandler to juggle the ball and fumble. Sock Holt, a speedy tackle, took the ball across for a touchdown. Thomason's place kick failed and the score was tied.

Rothstein took Thomason's kickoff on his own 40-yard line. The Bulldogs marched to two first downs, but a pass from Chandler was intercepted by Mizell on Tech's 35-yard line. Mizell punted high to Chandler, who was downed 24 yards from Georgia's goal.

Georgia punted and Tech took up the burden again in midfield. Smashes, led by Mizell, carried the ball 20 yards but the Bulldog line stiffened and the slippery ball caused two passes to sail wide and Georgia got the ball on her own 30-yard line as the third period closed.

With the start of the final quarter Chandler punted toward Thomason, who ran the ball back 11 yards to Tech's 43-yard line. Three short gains and two penalties placed Tech on the Georgia 48-yard line but here disaster overtook the Yellow Jackets.

This came in the form of Bryant, who crashed through the Tech line to block Mizell's punt then completed the work by picking the ball up and traveling 50 yards for a touchdown.

of the picture. The nine football coaches convened to draft their schedules for next Fall, six big games going into the discard as a result of Iowa's rejection. The 1930 gridiron opponents for Iowa were to have been Chicago, Illinois, Michigan, Minnesota, Wisconsin and Purdue.

While Burt Ingwersen, Iowa's football coach, declined to make any statement, it is understood he has partially completed a tentative football schedule for next year, anticipating an adverse decision from the faculty committee. Overtures are understood to have been made for games with Notre Dame, Southern California, Pittsburgh, Nebraska and other important teams.

While they did not vote, all athletic directors of the conference attended today's meeting and took a prominent part in the cross-examination of Professors Williams and Lauer. Chief among them were Amos Alonzo Stagg of Chicago, Fielding H. Yost of Michigan, and George Huff of Illinois. As they emerged from the meeting most of them were outwardly cheery, although Stagg seemed weary of the long-drawn debate.

Summary of Iowa's Plea.

In its second plea within six months for reinstatement, Iowa warranted that it had restored its athletic structure to good amateur order.

Each charge and question of the conference faculty committee, which first acted last May and refused the initial plea of reinstatement June 4, was categorically answered, some of the charges being admitted and some denied. Following the treatment of the charges, the petition stated, in summary:

"Iowa believes that action against the university has served its purpose. This punishment has already been severe. The stigma cast on the whole school has been resolutely borne during the past months. Further penalty cannot effect an improvement in athletic conditions. Those in control of affairs at Iowa cannot see how it is possible for them to do more than has been done."

The petition also revealed officially that George T. Bresnahan, charged with proselyting by the faculty committee, had been removed from his position as director of intercollegiate athletics at Iowa, retaining his position as head track coach with no further administrative duties. The report explained that Bresnahan had always balked against assuming the directorship, which was subsequently found to be "unworkable." As a result, E. T. Lauer, a faculty member, now has complete control of athletics at Iowa.

Charges and the Replies.

High lights of the long petition, covering seven and one-half single-spaced typewritten pages and dealing with all charges, follow:

Charge A: That certification of blanks as to the scholastic eligibility of students had been taken out of the registrar's hands by the president of the University of Iowa to permit greater freedom in certifying athletes for conference competition.

Reply: The arrangement was made by the athletic board and not the president. Eligibility matters are now in the hands of a committee from the university's teaching faculty. The chairman of the athletic board is the chairman of this committee. The director of athletics is not a member of the committee. The athletic board has ordered certification to be in full accord with conference regulations. This Fall blanks were signed by the registrar.

Charge B: That an athletic fund to subsidize athletics existed at Iowa during the period it had its championship football team (1921 and 1922) and that approximately $10,000 was expended yearly from this fund, which was administered in Iowa City by —— (no name given); that during the early part of Dr. Paul E. Belting's administration as director of athletics at Iowa this fund was discontinued or allowed to dwindle to small proportions, if it existed at all; that members of the coaching staff and university alumni have been insistent athletic moneys of university be diverted into this fund to aid athletes; that about two years ago this athletic fund was revived to the full knowledge of Iowa officials, amounting to approximately $3,500 last year, and that an Iowa high school coach was employed to raise money for the fund in 1927 to obtain athletes for Iowa.

Existence of Fund Admitted.

Reply: Existence of the fund is admitted, but it was administered strictly as a loan fund with notes taken for every amount granted. Some notes have been paid. The fund was not discontinued with the coming of Belting nor did Belting take a hostile attitude toward the fund. Instead, he and the local administrator of the fund worked out a scheme of administration whereby a member of the athletic staff would work with the local administrator of the fund. Only when the president refused to allow this did Belting drop the idea. Coaches and alumni have suggested diversion of athletic money to the fund to aid athletes, feeling Iowa was hampered in competition with Big Ten schools in larger cities, having larger official loan funds, numerous scholarships, lower tuition and, as they rightly believed, unofficial loan funds. It was not done, however. There was no unusual revival two years ago.

The mention of the sum $3,500 makes it seem this fund is confused with the so-called "work fund" on which the Big Ten investigator apparently was uninformed or did not choose to mention. This fund was instituted by members of the athletic staff and Iowa City business men to meet an emergency caused by weakness of the regular university employment office. The plan had full knowledge of Mr. Belting. By this plan, a number of business men agreed to pool their efforts to give employment to athletes. Those business men with jobs to fill would give them to athletes; those not having jobs would contribute to a fund; many who needed extra help but who couldn't afford the added expense would be reimbursed from the central fund.

Takes Up Question About Jobs.

A complete record shows (1) that athletes in every case received their money directly from the man for whom they worked; (2) that the jobs were bona fide and all men but one gave honest service; (3) that the amount earned varied from $7 to $15 a week, with the average about $9. The Iowa high school coach in question was employed by sponsors of the subsidizing fund and not by any official department of the university. The coach raised barely enough for his personal expenses. The athletic fund has been definitely closed. The "work fund" was temporary and has been closed, and with the establishment of a comprehensive student employment service, which guarantees that athletes will receive only such assistance as is given to students generally, the university has every assurance it will not be revived. All employment of students will be bona fide, without possibilities of sinecures for athletes.

Charge C—That the board of control of athletics at Iowa prior to 1924 permitted the diversion of some funds from the sale of year books to the unofficial alumni athletic fund.

Reply—The diversion of athletic funds was in all cases a commission on the sale of athletic year books, the commission ranging from 2½ to 4 per cent, with increased commissions for sales above 2,000 books up to a maximum of 6 per cent. Originally, this concession had gone to one man who organized the sale, using athletes as salesmen. This practice was discontinued a year before Dr. Belting took office. Dr. Belting continued the practice of allowing letter men to sell on commission. He did not oppose "diversion of funds." On the contrary, he actually diverted a lump sum into a trust fund deposited in an Iowa City bank for loans to athletes. As chairman of the board he did this without the approval or knowledge of the athletic board.

The present status is: The department engaged both athletic and non-athletic students to sell year books on a 2½ per cent commission after consultation with Commissioner John L. Griffith and the conference faculty committee, pending definite action.

Denies Charge Categorically.

Charge D—That the university was billed for athletic goods in excess of the price and value and the balance was used unofficially in connection with the university athletics.

Reply—The charge of excessive billing is categorically denied.

Charge E—It is reported that prior to 1924 athletes were permitted to sign notes for tuition at the university treasurer's office; that the report of the University of Iowa business office for 1925-1927 and 1927-28 indicates Coaches Bresnahan and Barry guaranteed a large number of these notes, and that those who administered the alumni athletic fund took up the notes when necessary.

Reply—All students, whether athletes or not, had access to this privilege and every effort was made to collect all notes, although the system did lead to some abuses with regard to athletes. The practice of taking notes from students has been discontinued by action of the finance committee of the State Board of Education. Back indebtedness, if notes were due, has been collected before persons were allowed to register. Seventeen athletes were denied registration, on this score. If notes falling due are not paid, registration will be canceled and recommendation for a degree not made.

Charge F—A certain high school athletic coach was given certain university credits at Iowa during the 1924 Summer session in absentia so he could renew his teaching license. Two years later two of his star athletes entered Iowa.

Reply—No credit was given for work not actually done by said coach. The coming of certain athletes from the coach's school had no connection with the credit episode.

Sports of the Times

Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

By JOHN KIERAN.

SEGMENT from a communication from a Navy man on the service football snarl:

"Sir—Football may develop Army officers, but do you have to be a football player of All-American calibre before entering West Point to be assured of real success in the Army? If so, imagine the perturbation with which Jeff Davis dispatched Robert E. Lee to command in front of Richmond in '62. A year later pity this same Lee as he watches Jackson disappear to the westward in his flank march on Chancellorsville. Can't you hear him saying: 'Oh, if that man had only thrown one forward pass for dear old West Point'?

"Can't you imagine Woodrow Wilson in the Summer of '18 pondering on J. J. Pershing and muttering to himself: 'How much safer I would feel if Walter Camp had mentioned him just once, if only for the second team?' What of today? How must you and I feel when we look at the list of Major Generals and discover therein the name of Douglas MacArthur, one of our main military leaders in any trouble of the next sixteen years, and he, the discoverer of the basic principle (discovered in '20 or '21) that the sure stepping to military success is an All-American rating before entering West Point. I hate to let you in on this, but I'm pretty sure you will discover that the best he did was about two years as a right fielder of the baseball team. There may be other Generals in the Army whose football record is no better. We should not lose a minute in correcting the situation. * * * R. A. T."

Just a Coincidence.

It's odd that, in a recent conversation, Major Gen. William Ruthven Smith, Superintendent of the Military Academy, brought up the same subject but in a slightly different way. He was sitting in his paneled office at the Point, a large room with portraits of famous graduates decorating the walls and windows that, to the east, overlooked the placid river.

The subject of the general staff had been reached by a flank movement. After Major Gen. Smith had explained the Army stand in the football debate, the visitor summoned up courage enough to mumble something about West Point football stars who were no longer in the service.

"All right," said the superintendent briskly, "Name them."

"Well, there was Oliphant, and Vidal, and Garbisch, and French, and Sprague, for instance."

"Oliphant served through the war period," said the superintendent. "He was graduated in 1918 and resigned in 1922. Vidal graduated in a special class late in 1918 and resigned in 1926. It doesn't look as though they rushed out of the Army immediately upon graduation. Garbisch was offered a fine business opportunity while he was still a cadet. Upon graduation, he accepted it and now has a high position in a big corporation. French was dropped for deficiency in studies. He did not graduate. As for Sprague, who resigned shortly after graduation last year——"

Here Major Gen. Smith gave the reasons why Mort Sprague resigned, and they were highly creditable to that young man. But since they were entirely personal, there is no need to drag them before the general public.

In High Society.

It was after that discussion that the superintendent brought up the subject of football and the general staff.

"Here's the Army list," said the superintendent, lifting a book from his desk, "Let's see now. H'm, Major Generals. Major Gen. Dennis E. Nolan, D. S. C. and D. S. M., class of '96, football letter man. Major Gen. Mahlon Craig, D. S. M., class of '98, football letter man. Major Gen. W. D. Connor, D. S. M., class of '97, football letter man. Not so bad, eh?"

There may be those who would beard the lion in his den, the Douglas in his hall, but it seemed the wiser thing in this instance to nod rapidly and remark: "Very good, sir."

"Brigadier Generals," continued the superintendent, turning the page, "H'm, here's Aultman. Brig. Gen. D. E. Aultman, D. S. C., class of '94, and a very fine guard, he was, too. Football letter man, of course. Here's King. Brig. Gen. Edward L. King, D. S. C. and D. S. M., class of '96. He was fullback and captain. Here's Heintzelman, he was an end. Here's Lott. He was a guard. Here's Eltinge and Caldwell and Cruikshank, who played baseball, too. I guess that will do to show that not all our football men left the Army immediately upon graduation."

More Army Lists.

At this point Lieut. Col. Whipple and Captain Wells produced lists that gave the details on all football letter men at West Point since the game was taken up on the Plains back in 1891. The total showed 322 football letter men in that time, of whom 41 either resigned after longer or shorter terms in the Army or did not graduate. Just what percentage of non-football men resigned or did not graduate over the same period deponent saith not. Captain Wells should figure it out. It would probably be another argument in favor of football as a developer of officer material.

But without going into ancient history, it might interest modern football fans to note the trend among West Point football letter men of late years. In the class of '25 at the Point, for instance, there were twenty-five cadet resignations upon graduation. That's an unduly high number. Maybe they had a poor chef at the Point that year. In any case, only one football letter man was among the twenty-five. That was Garbisch.

Mort Sprague is the only football letter man who has resigned since that time, but Pritchard and Ellinger were scholarship casualties. They did not graduate. In the classes of 1925 to 1929 inclusive, 37 cadets were awarded football letters. Of that number, 33 are still in the Army. Not a bad showing at all.

The General Makes It Plain.

"Would you say," the superintendent was asked, "that the Army was ready to play the Navy at football, but that the Navy was ready to play the Army only under certain conditions? In other words, they are the ones who are blocking traffic."

"Not only that," said Major Gen Smith, "but their offers of compromise are out of place from our point of view. It's like the man across the street coming to you and saying that he's going to take your house and lot from you. You tell him he can't do that. You own both. So then he says, Navy fashion: 'Let's be sporting about this thing and compromise. I'll only take your house.' Naturally, you would defend your house from any such compromise."

Wonder what they will think of the General's little story down at Annapolis, Md.? Perhaps Admiral Robison will think up one to match it.

IOWA OFFICIALS CALL BIG TEN BAN UNJUST

'Atrocious' Is Mahan's Comment —Alumni President Defends the University.

IOWA CITY, Iowa, Dec. 7 (AP).—Expressions of disappointment and a feeling that Iowa had suffered an injustice were voiced today by University of Iowa officials and students following the refusal of the Big Ten Conference to reinstate the Hawkeye school.

B. E. Mahan, director of the extension division, said, "I think Iowa was given a raw deal. The action was atrocious and not at all just, but Iowa will have to make the best of it."

Emerson W. Nelson, captain of the 1927 football team, said: "We might just as well go ahead and schedule outside games and show the rest of the conference that we are good enough to be in it."

Professor Rudolph Kuever, pharmacy representative on the athletic council, expressed disappointment and said the committee action was not what he expected.

Eric C. Wilson, university news editor and former Iowa Olympic track star, said, "There is something back of the whole thing."

Ingalls Swisher, Iowa alumnus and former Mayor here, said, "The alumni will be plenty sore. I am not in favor of any counter attacks until Dean Williams and Mr. Lauer have been consulted."

Dean George F. Kay of the College of Liberal Arts regretted "exceedingly that the action was taken, and at present I cannot understand the basis on which the decision was reached."

Many students expressed the belief that other members of the conference might withdraw.

Ben Swisher of Waterloo, Iowa, president of the alumni association, expressed surprise. "I am sorry to hear it," he said. "I both regret it and think the action was not fair. I don't know the details and presume that no one but those on the committee does, but personally I think there is no material difference in the conduct of athletics at Iowa than at any of the other schools of the conference."

FOOTBALL GIANTS DEFEAT FRANKFORD

Two Long Dashes for Touchdowns on a Muddy Field Bring Victory by 12 to 0.

FRIEDMAN, FEATHER SCORE

Former Runs 23 Yards Through Line—Feather Intercepts Pass and Races 56 Yards.

Special to The New York Times.

PHILADELPHIA, Dec. 7.—Streaking over the mud-covered field for runs of twenty-three and fifty-six yards, Benny Friedman and Feather carried the New York Giants eleven to a 12-to-0 victory over the Frankford Yellow Jackets today. Friedman snaked through the line in the first period for the first New York touchdown on a twenty-three-yard dash and Feather intercepted a pass and sprinted fifty-six yards for another score in the last quarter. The Giants have beaten the Yellow Jackets twice this season.

The line-up:

Giants (12).		Yellow Jackets (0).
Flaherty	L. E.	Koston
S. Owen	L. T.	Behman
McMullen	L. G.	Hanson

BIG SIX WILL SIFT SUBSIDIZING RUMORS

Fact-Finding Committee to Be Formed for Athletic Probe, Nebraska Official States.

KANSAS CITY, Dec. 7 (AP).—A fact-finding committee to investigate rumors of alleged subsidization of athletes in the Big Six Conference will be formed, it was announced tonight by Herb D. Gish, athletic director of the University of Nebraska.

LAKEVILLE CLUB ELECTS.

Jonas Again Named President of Golfers at Great Neck.

Special to The New York Times.

GREAT NECK, L. I., Dec. 7.—The result of the annual election of officers held by the Lakeville Golf and Country Club in the clubhouse last night was announced by Secretary Franklin P. Pratt today.

Nathan S. Jonas was re-elected president. Dr. Frederick Russel was elected first vice president, George J. Atwell second vice president, Harry A. Harris third vice president, and Frederick Gretsch treasurer. Pratt was re-elected secretary. A board of governors, consisting of eighteen members of the organization, also was elected.

DIEGEL TRIUMPHS IN P. G. A. TOURNEY

He got his 3 and Diegel sank a two-footer for a half. Match even.

No. 3, 325 Yards, Par 4.

Farrell played a weak pitch shot, his ball landing on the green fifty feet short of the pin, which was in the back of the green. Diegel was about twelve feet short of the cup. Farrell's long approach putt fell four feet shy of being up. After Diegel had missed his try for a 3, Farrell failed to hit his four-footer firmly enough to hold the line and he lost the hole, 5 to 4. Diegel 1 up.

No. 4, 565 Yards, Par 5.

Both were well on the green on their third shots, but Diegel's ball was only six inches behind the hole. Farrell conceded a 4 after his putt from twenty feet had missed the cup by a wide margin. Diegel 2 up.

No. 5, 398 Yards, Par 4.

Farrell's drive on this elbow hole was off the course to the right. His ball went into an unplayable lie in an earth crack. There was no way to play it, and Johnny took the stroke and distance penalty and returned to the tee. His next drive was straight, but his approach was over the green. After a good chip shot Johnny missed a putt for a 6 and gave the hole to Diegel, who was close to the hole after playing 4. Diegel 3 up.

No. 6, 243 Yards, Par 3.

Diegel reached the green with a brassie, but Farrell's brassie was badly hooked. The ball was headed for the bad lands, but hit a spectator and left Johnny a pitch from smooth grass. The Quaker Ridge pro's pitch over a trap left him a twelve-foot putt for a 3, which he missed. Diegel laid his approach putt dead from thirty-five feet and won with a 3. Diegel 4 up.

No. 7, 336 Yards, Par 4.

Both had good pitch shots to the elevated green. Diegel missed a try for a birdie from twelve feet and Farrell holed his putt of ten feet. It was the first hole won by Farrell. Diegel 3 up.

No. 8, 470 Yards, Par 4.

Farrell's long iron second shot went into a sand trap. Diegel's long pitch shot also was trapped, exactly hole high. Farrell played a spectacular bunker shot to within a foot of the hole. Diegel's out left him a six-foot putt, which he missed. Diegel, 2 up.

No. 9, 375 Yards, Par 4.

Diegel's approach was on the green, only eight feet from the hole. Farrell was thirty feet past the cup, with a down-hill putt. Farrell dropped his long putt and Diegel missed his short one, his ball grazing the right side of the cup. Diegel, 1 up.

No. 10, 320 Yards, Par 4.

Farrell's approach stopped twenty feet short of the pin. Diegel followed by leaving himself thirty feet short. They halved in 4s. Diegel, 1 up.

No. 11, 480 Yards, Par 4.

Farrell, using a spoon for his second shot, was just short of the green. Diegel got on with an iron. Farrell's chip shot was much too strong and ran twelve feet beyond the hole. Diegel laid a long approach putt within four feet and got his 4, winning the hole when Farrell missed. Diegel, 2 up.

No. 12, 192 Yards, Par 3.

Diegel hit a poor No. 1 iron shot to the right of the green. His ball stopped on the brink of a tree basin, from which it would have cost him a penalty stroke to lift. Farrell also had a poor tee shot and his ball stopped on bare, hard ground to the right of the green. Each had a trap to pitch over. Diegel tried to play one off the bank but his ball overran the hole twenty-five feet. Farrell, laying a niblick almost flat on the hard clay, made a great pitch shot to within two feet of the hole. Diegel missed his putt to get a half. Diegel, 1 up.

No. 13, 392 Yards, Par 4.

Diegel had a drive fifty yards beyond Farrell's tee shot but they both were short on their pitch shots and the hole was halved in 4's. Diegel, 1 up.

No. 14, 523 Yards, Par 5.

After two woods, Farrell was left with a down-hill lie, but he pitched splendidly to within ten feet of the flag. Diegel's third shot was pitched about twelve feet from the pin. They halved in 5's. Diegel, 1 up.

No. 15, 370 Yards, Par 4.

Farrell's drive was pulled and it was headed for trouble until it hit a spectator, leaving Johnny a good fairway lie. Both pitched on the green and halved in 4's. Diegel, 1 up.

No. 16, 150 Yards, Par 3.

Both got on the green in the valley below the tee, Diegel being only nine feet away, but above the cup. Farrell got down in two from below the cup and they halved in 3's. Diegel, 1 up.

No. 17, 298 Yards—Par 4.

Farrell again was short on his pitch shot. Again Diegel failed to take advantage of this opening, for his second shot barely got on the green, leaving him a longer approach putt than Farrell had. Diegel's long putt was a good one and left him close to the hole. Farrell then ran down his tremendous putt for a 3 to square the match. Measured later, Farrell's putt was announced as fifty-seven feet. Match all square.

No. 18, 475 Yards—Par 5.

Diegel's drive stopped on a bare spot off the fairway and directly behind his ball was a clump of bushy grass that interfered with his back swing. It was impossible for him to get home in two, and his second shot landed in the grassy hollow 100 yards short of the elevated green. Two good woods put Farrell home, his ball being just off the front edge of the green. Diegel's next put him approximately in 3 where Farrell was in 2. Both took three more to get down after chipping five feet past the cup. Farrell, 1 up.

AFTERNOON ROUND.

No. 19, 360 Yards, Par 4.

Farrell was short on his pitched approach and took a 5. Diegel put his second four feet from the pin, and was conceded a 3. Match square.

No. 20, 166 Yards, Par 3.

Farrell was short of the green on his tee shot, but he chipped up from a distance of fifty feet and halved in 3, Diegel taking two putts from a distance of twenty feet. Match all square.

No. 21, 325 Yards, Par 4.

Both had good second shots, Diegel's stopping twenty feet away and Farrell's fifteen. Johnny's chance for a birdie was blocked by a half stymie. They halved in 4s. Match all square.

No. 22, 565 Yards, Par 5.

Both had great third shots, Farrell pitching to within seven feet of the pin and Diegel's ball stopping two feet inside of him. Farrell's try for a 4 was close, but it slid by the cup. Diegel holed his birdie. Diegel, 1 up.

No. 23, 398 Yards, Par 4.

Farrell put his second on the green, and Diegel put his in a sand trap to the right of the green. Diegel's third went over the green. He lost the hole, 5 to 4. Match all square.

No. 24, 243 Yards, Par 3.

Farrell's tee shot was pulled and his second went across the green. Diegel's drive was dead on the pin and just behind the green. He got a 3 to win the hole. Diegel, 1 up.

No. 25—336 Yards, Par 4.

Both were well on the green in 2, each about twenty feet from the pin, and they halved in 4s. Diegel, 1 up.

No. 26.—470 Yards, Par 4.

Farrell got home with a long, low iron. Diegel had the longer drive, but he was twenty feet further from the pin. Both had good approach putts to half in 4. Diegel, 1 up.

No. 27—375 Yards, Par 4.

Farrell had to hit a long iron shot to get home. He was on the deep narrow green nicely, but sixty feet short of the pin. Diegel was forty feet short. Farrell knocked his approach putt six feet past the hole. Diegel, after taking his putting stance, walked away and asked camera men on the roof of the nearby professional's shop to stop taking pictures. Leo then left himself six feet short on his approach putt. The balls were about an equal distance from the hole and Referee Willie Kidd had to measure before he was sure Diegel was away. Diegel hit a poor putt which rolled around the cup and stymied Farrell. In attempting to run his ball past, Farrell knocked Diegel's ball into the hole, giving Leo a 4. Diegel, 2 up.

No. 28—320 Yards, Par 4.

Farrell was well inside of Diegel in 2, but in trying from seven feet for a birdie, Johnny stymied himself behind Diegel's ball. In trying to get by, Farrell again knocked his opponent's ball into the hole, giving Diegel a 3. Diegel, 3 up.

No. 29—480 Yards, Par 4.

Both had good drives. Diegel's second went into the crowd to the left of the green. Farrell's second was over the green and to the left. Diegel laid his third five feet from the hole. Farrell also made a good shot, but hit Diegel's ball. Diegel missed a putt of six feet for a 4 and Farrell missed a five-footer. Diegel, 3 up.

No. 30—192 Yards, Par 3.

Farrell hooked his tee shot and after a good approach missed a five-foot putt for a 3. Diegel hit a fine tee shot, fifteen feet from the pin and he won the hole with a 3. Diegel 4 up.

No. 31—392 Yards, Par 4.

Farrell hooked his drive and also his second shot. Farrell's good approach putt left him a three-foot putt for a 4, but Diegel, planting his approach ten feet to the left of the pin, holed the putt for a birdie. Diegel 5 up.

No. 32—523 Yards, Par 5.

Diegel put together two exceptional wood shots, his second stopping on the green twenty feet from the pin. Farrell hooked a brassie shot into the crowd, where it hit a spectator and stopped on rough ground. Farrell's third left him fifteen feet short of the hole. Diegel's approach putt left him three feet from the hole for a birdie 4. Farrell tried hard to get his putt down, but his ball stopped just short and he conceded Diegel his 4, ending the match.

2 ARCHERS BEAT GOLFERS.

Thomson-Strout Set New Pinehurst Mark of 70 in Winning.

PINEHURST, N. C., Dec. 7.—Shattering all previous Pinehurst records for shooting the links with bow and arrow, C. S. Strout of Biddeford, Me., tyro archer who recently scored a possible 54 in a target tournament, tallied a 70 over the No. 3 course of the Pinehurst Country Club today, and with his archer partner, Eric D. Thomson of New York, defeated two golfers by the score of 7 and 6. The linksmen who lost the first archery-golf contest of the season here were W. Irving Johnson of Saco, Me., and Eric Nelson of Boston.

STATE GOLFERS BACK STAND ON EXPENSES

OLER OFFERS RESOLUTION

Proposal Is Passed Unanimously—Believes Rules Are "For Best Interests of Amateur Golf."

By LINCOLN A. WERDEN.

The New York State Golf Association executive board at its annual session yesterday at the Hotel Biltmore unanimously passed a resolution expressing its support of the United States Golf Association in its decision to forbid the paying of the expenses of teams representing State and sectional golf associations.

The resolution was a vote of confidence to the national body for its stand in the Lesley Cup controversy, as the proposal of Wesley M. Oler of Apawamis, which was adopted, called for the support of the U. S. G. A. "in the matter of amateur rules, particularly as they apply to the payment by the local associations of expenses of golfers to various events."

The complete resolution is as follows:

"Resolved, That the executive committee of the New York State Golf Association, at its annual meeting, desires to express its support of the position taken by the United States Golf Association in the matter of the amateur rules, particularly as they apply to the payment by the local associations of expenses of golfers to various events, believing with the United States Golf Association that these rules are for the best interest of amateur golf."

Committee to Pick Sites.

Although it was decided to support the establishing of the turf garden at Cornell University, which will study grasses and soil condition in general, especially of upper New York State, the final steps were left to the executive body. The selection of the sites for the various championships was also a matter that was left to the committee, although it was said that the amateur event will be held on some Long Island course.

Don M. Parker, the president of the association, in a brief review outlined the work of the past year and then stressed the fact that although the association intended to schedule only a few tournaments for the coming season he wanted them to be outstanding successes. P. R. McCrae, secretary-treasurer, announced a treasury balance of $947.09.

Will Avoid Conflicts.

It was also stated that in order to avoid a recurrence of the conflicting tournament dates of last year the Shawnee open would be held on the Tuesday and Wednesday of the week during which the New York State open will be scheduled. The State championship will be played on a Friday and Saturday, and it is expected to be held somewhere in the metropolitan district.

Among those attending the session besides Messrs. Parker, McCrae and Oler were Sherrill Sherman of Yahnundasis, L. G. Spindler, Westchester Country Club; John F. Nash of Onondaga, Syracuse, and W. T. Hamilton of the Westchester Country Club. Following the business meeting, the committee attended a luncheon.

North Carolina Eleven Defeats Duke University by 48 to 7 Before 15,000

DUKE LOSES, 48-7, TO NORTH CAROLINA

Tar Heels Run and Pass Way to Victory Before 15,000 to Close Season.

WARD SCORES ON LONG RUN

Reverses Field and Races 47 Yards in Third Period—Victors in Front at Half, 21-7.

DURHAM, N. C., Dec. 7 (AP).—The University of North Carolina Tar Heels passed and ran their way to a 48-to-7 victory over the Duke University football team today to win the North Carolina championship. The game was the last of the year for both elevens and was witnessed by 15,000 persons.

North Carolina kicked off and Dewey punted on the second play to Branch, who returned the ball to Duke's 35-yard line. Nash and Ward made a first down, Ward made one yard at centre and Nash slid off left tackle for twenty-two yards and a touchdown. Spaulding missed the kick for the extra point, but officials ruled that Duke was offside and it was counted.

Spaulding kicked off for North Carolina to Murray, who returned the ball to his 33-yard line, and on the second play Murray made eleven yards around left end for a first down. The Tar Heels held, and Buie punted to Branch on the Carolina 25-yard line. The Tar Heels started down the field and after once being halted battered the ball down to Duke's 8-yard line as the period ended with the score 7 to 0.

Scores on Pass to Nash.

Ward passed to Nash for eight yards and a touchdown on the first play of the second period and Spaulding added the point.

North Carolina kicked off and Duke made two first downs, one on line bucks and the other a twenty-one-yard pass, Buie to Godfrey. Godfrey fumbled on North Carolina's 26-yard line, Adkins, subbing for Rowe, recovering. Branch slid off right tackle for forty yards, putting the ball on Duke's 38-yard line. Two line smashes and a pass put the ball on Duke's 5-yard line. Then after two plays Magner passed to Nash for a touchdown. As Duke was offside, Spaulding's low try for the extra point was good, making the count 21 to 0.

Near the end of the period, Hayes of Duke punted to Wyrick on Carolina's 28-yard line. Wyrick returned ten yards, but the ball was called back to the 30-yard line and North Carolina was penalized twenty-five yards for unnecessary roughness. Duke received the ball on the Tar Heels' 5-yard line and on the fourth play Brewer dived across for a touchdown. Brewer then smashed through the North Carolina line for the point and the half ended with the score 21 to 7.

Duke cut loose with a drive that looked like it was headed for a touchdown immediately after the kick-off in the third period. Rosky returned the kick-off fourteen yards to his own 33-yard line. Buie passed ten yards to Rosky. Then Brewer and Buie took the ball to the Tar Heels' 40-yard line on line bucks, and Buie passed twenty yards to Hayes. The Tar Heels held and took the ball on their own 22-yard line.

The Tar Heels worked the ball into Duke territory, but could not hold it. Finally, a Carolina punt rolled over the goal line. Duke punted from its 20-yard line, Branch caught it on his own 46-yard line and returned it to Duke's 4-yard line. Two plays took it over and Spaulding kicked goal.

Buie Punts Out of Bounds.

North Carolina kicked off and on the third play Buie punted out of bounds on his own 47-yard line. Ward, on the first play, cut through right tackle, reversed his field and raced forty-seven yards for a touchdown. Spaulding missed the point and the third quarter ended with the count 34 to 7.

Duke could not gain at the start of the fourth period, and North Carolina got the ball on its own 45-yard line. The Tar Heels started a series of trick plays that had the Blue Devils hunting all around for the ball. They marched steadily down the field to the 3-yard line, where House went through centre for a touchdown. Branch dropkicked the point.

Late in the period Beaver punted to the Tar Heels' 45-yard line. A 15-yard pass, Maus to Jackson, a 15-yard penalty against Duke when Rupe exchanged blows with Maus, another 15-yard penalty against Duke for roughness and a 3-yard end run by Jackson scored another touchdown for North Carolina. Jackson skirted the Duke left end for the extra point, and the game ended soon afterward.

ALL-AMERICAN POLL FAVORS MID-WEST

Associated Press Consensus Honors Five From That Section, Four From East.

CARIDEO POPULAR CHOICE

Notre Dame and Pitt Place Two Men Each—Cagle, Uansa and Holm Named for Back Field.

By The Associated Press.

The fifth annual All-American football team compiled by The Associated Press developed a new high mark for cooperation in the endeavor. More than 200 experts—215 in exact figures—answered the appeal of The Associated Press for their choices.

Sports editors and football writers of newspapers from every section of the United States—North, South, East and West—joined with coaches, officials, scouts and staff writers of The Associated Press in selecting the outstanding men in their positions throughout the nation.

Three teams were selected, the ranking being determined by the ballots.

The first team honors went to the Middle West, where rugged football was the order of a great season, with five places. The East, which had one of its greatest years, placed four, with the two other positions divided between the South and the Pacific Coast.

Two great teams, Notre Dame and Pittsburgh, qualified two players each for the All-American, the first time in five years that has happened.

Are Fellow-Townsmen.

Another odd development threw Youngstown, Ohio, into the glare of the sports spotlight, for the two ends, Fesler of Ohio State and Donchess of Pittsburgh, are fellow-townsmen.

The East outnumbered the other sections in the make-up of the squad of thirty-three named, placing twelve, to nine for the Middle West, six for the South, five for the Far West and one for the Southwest.

There was no doubt as to the selection of the quarterback when the balloting hit its full stride. Frank Carideo, "the brains of Notre Dame," moved out in front on the early returns and was never threatened. He ran up an impressive total of 123, with Alton Marsters, the injured Dartmouth star, second with 46, and little Albie Booth, Yale's spark plug, 20 points behind the Big Green quarter.

Joe Donchess, Pittsburgh's stalwart end, was almost as convincing. He was credited with 121 points, with Wesley Fesler of Ohio State taking the other flank position with 99. No other ends menaced the position of the leaders.

Frank Tappaan, Southern California, qualified for the second team with 61, along with Vernon (Catfish) Smith of Georgia, who had 29 supporters. Frank Baker of Northwestern and Wear Schoonover of Arkansas were supported by 27 and 16, respectively.

Led the Tackles.

Elmer (Red) Sleight, 200-pound streak of Purdue, led all the tackles of the country with 82 choices, and another fast big man, Bronko Nagurski of Minnesota took the other tackle position with 65. Nagurski, however, was favored by 50 other close observers for fullback. He has also played end and guard at odd times.

Ted Twomey of Notre Dame and Sam Wakeman, Cornell, landed on the second team, Twomey with 56 and Wakeman scoring 55. Jap Douds, Washington and Jefferson, and Fred Sington, Alabama, completed the tackles honored, with Fay Vincent of Yale barely beaten.

Jack Cannon, Notre Dame's fighting guard, showed the way in his position with 80 choices, 30 more than Bert Schwartz of California.

Ray Montgomery, Pittsburgh, and Waldo (Pirpo) Greene, Yale, were given almost identical support and ran well ahead of Jack Law of Notre Dame and Ray Farris, the versatile North Carolina guard.

Ticknor Won Award.

Ben Ticknor, Harvard's busy snapper-back, won the centre award by 20 votes from Roy Riegels, California captain, whose splendid play throughout the season made the football world forget that he once ran the wrong way with the ball. Ticknor, a big, strong, roving centre, who was the defensive star of Harvard in every game, polled 83 votes for the place.

Tony Siano, Fordham captain, another sterling defensive player, barely won the third honor in a close contest with Tim Moynihan, Notre Dame's inspirational centre, who suffered a broken bone in his leg in the next to the last game on the Notre Dame schedule.

With the quarterback position consigned to Carideo beyond dispute by the landslide vote he polled, the other back-field positions developed more of a contest.

Octavius (Toby) Uansa, Pittsburgh, led the halfbacks with the highly complimentary total of 105 votes for one halfback position, and Keener Cagle, Army captain and an All-American choice of 1928, took the other place when he was given 71 votes to 64 for Ralph (Pest) Welch of Purdue.

The South won representation in the back field of the second eleven when 37 votes for Gene McEver of Tennessee elected him as Welch's running mate.

Ben Lom, California's capable threat, and Billy Banker, Tulane's brightest star, completed the halfbacks on the third team, with 31 and 27 ballots, respectively.

Glassgow, Iowa's great running back, and Elder, Notre Dame's fleet runner, almost crowded into the select class. There was also considerable support for Cy Leland of Texas Christian, Eddie Wittmer of Princeton and Lloyd Brazil of Detroit.

Big Bronko Nagurski had more votes for fullback than any other pile-driving, line-crushing ball carrier, but even this impressive total was exceeded by the number who preferred to have him at tackle on the mythical team, so the way was paved for Bernard (Tony) Holm, Alabama's powerful fullback, to win the last back-field nomination with 37 votes.

Pug Parkinson, another star Pittsburgh back, was runner-up, with Powerhouse Pomeroy of Utah third, Parkinson polling 27 votes and Pomeroy 16. Joe Savoldi of Notre Dame received enthusiastic support, as did Clark Hinkle, Bucknell, the East's leading scorer.

The 1929 selections follow:

W. AND M. DEFEATS HAMPDEN-SIDNEY

Scott Runs 70 Yards Through Losers' Team for First Touchdown—Score Is 20-6.

BRADFORD IN LONE TALLY

Dashes 35 Yards on 15-Yard Pass to Cross Goal for Hampden-Sidney.

Special to The New York Times.

RICHMOND, Va., Dec. 7.—The William and Mary eleven defeated the Hampden-Sidney team, 20-6, before 5,000 spectators in the Richmond Stadium today.

The victors had things their own way during practically the entire game. Hampden-Sidney's lone touchdown was scored about midway of the final quarter as the result of a 15-yard pass from Willis to Bradford, the latter racing 35 yards to the William and Mary goal.

William and Mary got off to a running start early in the opening period when Scott received a Hampden-Sidney punt on his 30-yard line and, after shaking off several tacklers, dashed 70 yards through the entire Hampden-Sidney team for the first William and Mary touchdown and the most spectacular play of the game. A pass from Scott to Darken was good for the extra point.

The teams battled on fairly even terms in the second period and neither was able to score, but after the half William and Mary came back with renewed vigor and Maxey took the ball on the Hampden-Sidney 20-yard line and circled for the second tally. Bauserman's drop kick for the extra point was low.

The victors tallied again in the final period on straight football. Scott received Hughes's punt on the 50-yard line and returned 15 yards before he was downed. With every William and Mary back sharing in the work, the ball was advanced to the Hampden-Sidney 2-yard line and Ryan plunged over centre for the touchdown.

William and Mary kicked off to Hampden-Sidney, and it was within the next few plays that Bradford snagged Willis's pass and ran 35 yards for the losers' only score. Hughes's drop kick for the extra point failed.

Lione threw a successful pass to Best for the 20 yards needed to count. Stamford added the extra point as a result of a completed pass from Lione to Page.

In the third session McKinley outplayed the home team, which never had a threatening chance. A strong attack via the air brought the ball from Tech's 20-yard mark to its opponents' 45-yard line and here Yznaga on a fake reverse play scampered unmolested for a touchdown. The count now favored the home charges, 14 to 12, the kick for extra point by Tech being too wide.

In the final session the Stamford eleven started a concentrated march down the field, which netted it 5 first downs, before Lione threw a 15-yard forward to Best for the final touchdown of the encounter. An attempted plunge through the line by Lione for the extra point failed.

CARNEGIE TECH TEAM DEPARTS FOR COAST

Twenty-seven Players Leave to Play Southern California Eleven Saturday.

Special to The New York Times.

PITTSBURGH, Dec. 7.—Carnegie Tech's football invasion of the West started late tonight. The players left for Chicago on the first leg of their trip to Los Angeles to meet the University of Southern California eleven next Saturday. There were twenty-seven in the party.

Although the final practice session of the season was held on the home field this morning, time will be taken at Dodge City, Iowa; Albuquerque, N. M., and Winslow, Ariz., for brief drills.

Coach Bob Waddell sprang a surprise this morning when he held the squad on the field for three hours and sent two varsity teams through a stiff scrimmage. After routine offensive and defensive work, two elevens were selected and they played a regulation game. A 7-7 tie resulted.

The program after the game on Saturday calls for a trip to Catalina Island on Sunday, a tour of the film studios on Monday, sightseeing in Los Angeles on Tuesday and the return home by way of San Francisco, Salt Lake City and Colorado Springs.

W. MARYLAND TAKES 11TH STRAIGHT, 12-0

By JOSEPH C. NICHOLS.

point far behind the scrimmage line, but Clary dashed in, intercepted and, running behind a quickly formed but solid interference, covered 25 yards for a score. The try for the extra point by place kick was blocked.

The futility of attempting to advance through line play became apparent at the very start of the game, when Roberts, after making one thrust at the Western Maryland wall for little gains, kicked from his own 32-yard line to the opponents' 30-yard strip.

Maryland found it less difficult to gain ground at the beginning and chalked up a first down on its first three rushes. But the ball soon became too soggy and dangerous to handle and the kicking game was resorted to for almost the entire first quarter.

Roberts Kicks Out of Danger.

Maryland was placed in a dangerous position in the first few minutes of play, when a penalty put Maryland on its own 1-yard mark, but Roberts kicked to his own 35-yard line. Western Maryland essayed a pass from this point, but Radice dashed in to intercept the oval and brought it to midfield.

Western Maryland was put on the defensive in the second session, when after Radiel again intercepted a pass on Maryland's 43-yard line he collaborated with Evans to advance the ball 20 yards by forwards. Further efforts along this line were ineffectual, however, and Chalmers punted.

After an exchange of a brace of kicks, which ended with Maryland in possession on its own 33-yard line, the old line team set up another forward pass attack that brought the ball all the way to Western Maryland's 4-yard line. Maryland lost a chance to score when Evans's pass was knocked down by Doughty behind the Western Maryland goal.

Try for Field Goal Fails.

Western Maryland also fought its way to a position from which to score in the same quarter when it brought the ball to Maryland's 21-yard line. Pincura stepped back to try for a placement kick, but the ball failed to rise.

In the third quarter Maryland made some effort to advance by straight football, but was repulsed and resorted once more to punting. Western Maryland also tried plunges, but adopted the kicking game when fumbles became dangerously common.

Maryland played straight football in the fourth, after Clary's score, but the opposing line proved strong enough to withstand the thrusts made against it.

CENTENARY ELEVEN WINS ON LONG RUN

53-Yard Dash for Touchdown by Hanna Beats Loyola of New Orleans, 6-0.

LOSERS' ATTACK REPULSED

Victors, In Own Territory, Stop Drives, Showing Strong Defense—Fannin Stars in Punting.

Special to The New York Times.

NEW ORLEANS, La., Dec. 7.—A brilliant dash by Jake Hanna, flashy Centenary quarterback, for 53 yards in the first period here today spelled defeat for Loyola University of New Orleans in the fourth clash of the two institutions. Hanna's run was through left tackle and came upon his first attempt to carry the ball. A place kick for extra point failed.

Loyola tried hard to score in the second, third and fourth quarters, but after working the ball deep into Centenary territory the visitors' line strengthened sufficiently to hold on the muddy field.

Following Hanna's score, Centenary played a defensive game, content to punt each time after holding the Wolves for downs.

Lopez and Tetlow uncorked a brief attack in the final quarter that gave the Loyola team another chance to score, but a pass over the goal line was incomplete.

The play of Captain Willis and Pattison stood out for Centenary in a line that was too powerful for Loyola while Fannin's punting saved the Wolves from a more disastrous defeat.

HALLECK STAR FOR VICTORS

Accounts for First Tally, Then Helps With a Pass in Sending In the Second.

Special to The New York Times.

PRINCETON, N. J., Dec. 7.—In its opening game of the season tonight the Princeton hockey team was defeated tonight by the St. Nicholas Club of New York, 3 to 0. Princeton showed lack of coordination in its attack while the visitors opened up in the last period of the game to ring up two tallies.

Coach Pudge Neidlinger's charges had been on the ice only a week previous to the encounter tonight. The Tigers were unable to make their attempts to score count although they had the puck well within scoring distance several times. Long shots were prevalent while the St. Nicholas sextet accounted for two of its points on short shots. Halleck accounted for the visitors' first tally in the second period on a fairly long shot from in front of the cage.

The visitors opened up in the final frame and tallied two points. Johnny Jones, Princeton star last year, took the puck from Halleck on a pass from behind the Tiger cage to ring up the counter. Ryan accounted for St. Nick's third score on a side shot after having brought the puck down the rink.

Captain Babe Adams of the Tiger sextet was the bulwark of defense for the Orange and Black. In the final period he was injured and carried from the rink. The extent of his injury is not known, although it is expected that he will not be out of practice for any great length of time.

The line-up:

St. Nicholas (3).		Princeton (0).

M'EVER TAKES LEAD AS TENNESSEE WINS

Whittaker, who replaced McEver, fumbled. The period ended on South Carolina's 40-yard line with the Gamecocks showing drive for the first time.

Tennessee's second-string backs found the wet ball hard to handle and twice lost it on fumbles. After an exchange of punts had shoved the Volunteers deep into their own territory, Reineke skirted end for twenty-three yards to bring the ball to midfield. The Gamecocks tightened and Reineke punted to South Carolina's 25-yard line.

The Tennessee reserves were unequal to the task of mustering a drive as the Gamecock forwards stiffened. The Volunteers drove to South Carolina's 20-yard line near the end of the period, but four plays gained only two yards and the Gamecocks took the ball on downs on their own 18-yard line. The half ended in a punting exchange, with the score: Tennessee 21, South Carolina 0.

An intercepted pass in midfield gave the Volunteers another chance as the third period opened. The 44-yard march began and ended with McEver scoring his third touchdown on a 2-yard smash through centre. A pass, Dodd to McEver, was good for the extra point.

McEver added his fourth touchdown after intercepting a pass on South Carolina's 40-yard line that started a 30-yard march. The Tennessee star crashed through centre for the last two yards and added the extra point with another line plunge. Hackman scored his second touchdown with a 38-yard dash off end, a pass for the extra point failed and the period ended with Tennessee leading, 41 to 0.

South Carolina punted to Dodd on his 40-yard line to open the final period, and, after a triple pass, Dodd flipped a short one to Hackman, who scampered 50 yards to a touchdown. McEver added the extra point with a plunge over centre.

An exchange of punts gave the Volunteers the ball on the Gamecocks' 30-yard line and McEver ended the march to touchdown with a smash off right tackle. A pass for extra point failed.

McEver's fifth touchdown in the fourth period ended the scoring. Reserves then started to filter in, and the Gamecocks, on an exchange of punts, forced the Volunteers deep into their own territory, but Tennessee staged a march that was on the South Carolina 2-yard line as the game ended.

WINNERS LEAD AT HALF, 15-9

Baker, Fordham, and Kelleher of Opposing Team Share Scoring Honors, Each With 10.

The Fordham University basketball team opened its season on its home ccurt last night, defeating the St. Francis College of Brooklyn quintet, 32 to 16. The Fordham five led at half time, 15 to 9.

Joe Baker of Fordham and Frank Kelleher of St. Francis shared the individual spotlight, each scoring ten points to lead his respective team. Baker tallied three field goals and four fouls and Kelleher caged one field goal and eight fouls.

The defense of the Fordham team was one of the high spots of the contest, for the visitors were held to two field goals, one made by Kelleher and the other by Mortell. St. Francis caged 12 fouls and Fordham scored six times from the penalty mark.

Mulligan of Fordham and Longley of St. Francis featured the play of the first half. Each tallied six points in the initial period. The St. Francis defense proved stubborn in the first half, but could not resist the fast passing attack of the victors in the second half. The St. Francis offense also faltered then, and Fordham outscored the Brooklynites, 17 to 7, in the final twenty minutes.

Mulligan's six points in the first half were all that he scored during the game, but they were enough to give him runner-up position to Baker and Kelleher in the matter of individual scoring.

A new City College record for scoring by an individual was set last night at the C. C. N. Y. gymnasium as the City College basketball team overwhelmed the Lafayette College five, 52 to 24, for its second victory of the season.

Milton Trupin, veteran forward of the Lavender quintet, accounted for the new record by tallying ten field goals for a total of 20 points. The old record was 18 points, set by George Schmidt in 1919 against Cathedral College.

Artie Musicant, veteran guard, was second highest scorer with 12 points on five field goals and two fouls, while De Phillips made 8 points on four field goals. Jack Adams with 8 points was Lafayette's high scorer. Only one foul was called against the Lavender all evening. Coach Holman used three complete teams against the Leopards.

Sander, Centre of Freshman Team Last Year, Shows Up Well in Varsity Debut.

Special to The New York Times.

PHILADELPHIA, Dec. 7.—Al Brodbeck of Mount Vernon, N. Y., helped Pennsylvania open its basketball season tonight with a 19-18 victory over St. Joseph's College. A crowd of 6,000 attended the game.

Brodbeck, although a regular last year, went in as a substitute for Ullrich, sophomore star from Trenton, with five minutes left in the first half. St. Joseph's held a 6 to 2 lead at the time.

Penn rallied to pull up on the short end of a 7-6 score at half time and then Brodbeck got started and scored three quick field goals in the second half. He also threw two fouls for a total of eight points.

Penn, 1928-29 Eastern intercollegiate champions, did not score a single field goal in the first half, and then got four in as many minutes during the last half. Captain Ed Lobley and Maurice McNiff, new guard, each scored a field goal, while Lobley tossed six fouls out of seven tries.

Harold Sander of Madison, Wis., a member of last year's undefeated freshman team, made his varsity début at centre and scored the first point of the season on a foul toss. Jim Peterson, last year's regular pivot man, relieved him later.

Kansas City Team Will Fly To Tulsa for Hockey Game

KANSAS CITY, Dec. 7 (AP).—Kansas City hockey players will descend on Tulsa Monday from the air. The squad, coach and trainer—fifteen in all—will fly to the Oklahoma town for the first of a two-game series which may change the American Hockey Association ranking. Tulsa now is in first place, Kansas City in second.

CRESCENT A. C. FIVE REPULSES RUTGERS

Assumes Early Lead and Holds It to the End to Triumph by 36 to 24.

KEATING GETS NINE POINTS

Grossman Is Second High Scorer—Boettcher, Former Rutgers Captain, With Victors.

Special to The New York Times.

NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J., Dec. 7.—Showing more experience in all phases of the game, the Crescent A. C. of Brooklyn defeated the Rutgers five, 36 to 24, in Ballantine Gymnasium this afternoon. The Brooklynites scored a victory over Coach Hill's team last year by 26 to 24.

The Crescents piled up a lead early in the first period and maintained it throughout, flashing an all-around game superior to that of the Scarlet quintet. The work of Keating, Schaenen and Guiler featured. Keating led in the scoring with nine points, Grossman being second with seven.

VERMONT FIVE WINS OPENING GAME, 27-26

Montreal A. A. A. Quintet, However, Extends Rivals Hard in a Closing Rally.

Special to The New York Times.

BURLINGTON, Vt., Dec. 7.—The University of Vermont won its first basketball game of the season here tonight, defeating Montreal A. A. A. in a hotly contested struggle, 27 to 26.

Vermont took the lead from the start and held it throughout, but Montreal always threatened to take it away. The score at half time was 15 to 10.

Later Vermont had a 10 point lead, at 23 to 13, but the Canadians crept up as the game neared its close.

STEVENS TECH FIVE TRIUMPHS BY 20-18

PERSSON STAR FOR VICTORS

Cages Deciding Goal After Brown Had Tied Score With Only Four Minutes to Play.

The Stevens Tech basketball team defeated Cathedral College of New York, 20 to 18, by a brilliant rally near the end of the game which was played at Hoboken last night. Left Forward Brown tied the score at 18-18 with only four minutes to go in the final half, and Captain Persson won for Stevens when he caged a field goal two minutes later.

Cathedral opened the game with a rushing attack that gave it a 10-3 lead midway in the first half. Stevens braced toward the end of the session and gained a few points, but at half time Cathedral had a lead of 12-7.

Cathedral began the second half with another fast attack and added six points before Stevens could get started. The Engineers then took command, however, and brought the score to 17-18 when Brown tied it up with a foul shot.

YALE WILL LAUNCH ITS WINTER SPORTS

Basketball Team to Open Season Against Upsala College on Tuesday Night.

SIX STARTS WEDNESDAY

Hockey Players to Meet Boston University—Swimmers in Action on Saturday.

NEW HAVEN, Conn., Dec. 7.—Yale's schedule of Winter sports will begin the coming week, during which the basketball, hockey and swimming teams will play their first games.

The basketball five will open its season first by meeting Upsala College in the gymnasium Tuesday night, the hockey will play Boston University in the New Haven arena on Wednesday and the swimmers will compete against a team of alumni stars in the Carnegie pool on Saturday evening.

No change in the coaching staff has been made in any Winter sport team except basketball, in which Elmer Ripley, formerly of Georgetown, has been appointed. He has had thirty candidates at work in the daily practice for two weeks. Four football stars—Albie Booth, Fred Linehan, Tommy Taylor and Al Beane—have joined the squad. Linehan will not compete until after Christmas because of a football injury.

Booth has practically recovered from the muscle injury which prevented his playing in the Princeton game, but is not likely to be used except as a reserve player at present. He captained the freshman team last year. Beane is a substitute and Taylor reserve centre or guard.

Study Keeps Nassau Busy.

Louis Nassau, forward, has not reported regularly because of an exacting law course. He led the league as individual scorer most of last season. Indications are that Nassau, J. L. Townsend Jr., H. Schane and E. Horwitz will be alternates as forwards in starting the season.

J. P. Patterson, T. G. Quintel, Captain Gus Nanry, G. A. Holloway and J. H. Beyer will be alternated at guard, with Taylor Beane and Booth injected into the play as reserves. Coach Ripley has adopted the five-man attack, and the team is functioning effectively. The passing has shown improvement and the shooting has gained accuracy.

The hockey team has two scheduled games the coming week, meeting Boston University Wednesday and the University Club of Boston on Friday night. Coach Larry Noble, Yale's former football, baseball and hockey star, is beginning his second season. He turned out last year a sextet which won the series from Harvard and Princeton and defeated most of Yale's other intercollegiate rivals.

Yale's line-up in its opening game will probably be as follows: Forwards, F. L. Luce, W. H. (Ding) Palmer and S. B. Iglehart; defense, Captain Bob Wilson, and D. H. Hickok, goal. F. Farrel, Luce and Palmer were regulars last year as centre and wing. The other wing has been given to

P. S. A. L. Elementary School Indoor Track Title Retained by P. S. 9, Brooklyn

P. S. 9 KEEPS TITLE IN P. S. A. L. MEET

Brooklyn School Repeats Victory Over P. S. 89 Manhattan, Winning, 63 Points to 47.

FOUR RECORDS SMASHED

P. S. 184 Manhattan Leads Junior High Division, Lowering Marks in Relay Races.

Four records were smashed and another was equaled as P. S. 9 of Brooklyn retained the title for the sixth successive year at the twenty-seventh annual running of the P. S. A. L. elementary schools indoor track and field championships at the 102d Combat Engineers' Armory yesterday. P. S. 184 of Manhattan captured the team honors in the junior high school division.

Approximately 3,200 schoolboys competed in the gala indoor event, and 9,000 to 10,000 crowded the balcony on all sides to see their classmates vie in a total of twenty-three events, three of which were for junior high school students.

Impressive ceremonies marked the opening of the meet. An Olympic parade of all the competitors, headed by the officials, the James Madison High School Band, led by Casper Fishbach, and a color guard from P. S. 43, Manhattan, preceded the start of the races. Gustavus T. Kirby, president of the P. S. A. L., and Dr. A. K. Aldinger, secretary of the P. S. A. L. and director of the games committee, were among the officials.

Wins From Main Rival.

P. S. 9 of Brooklyn, which won last year by the slim margin of 1 point over P. S. 89 of Manhattan, the score being 43 to 42, made its victory decisive over its chief rival yesterday, winning with a total of 63 points to 47 for P. S. 89, Manhattan. A close third was P. S. 83 of Brooklyn with 44, and fourth was another Brooklyn school, P. S. 157, with 27.

The outstanding record-breaking performance of the day was furnished by P. S. 184 of Manhattan, a junior high school, in the 440-yard relay, 120-pound class, for junior high schools. The quartet of Joseph Jackson, George Jackson, Delaney Norman and Charles Gerbasio shattered the record for the event in their preliminary heat, being clocked in 51 2-5 seconds, 3-5 second faster than the old mark of 52 seconds flat made by P. S. 39 of Manhattan on Jan. 7, 1927.

The Manhattan school boys then climaxed their afternoon's work by turning in the time of 50 4-5 seconds in the final, to win the event and establish their second record within an hour.

Triumph in Two Relays.

It was the fine running of the two P. S. 184, Manhattan, relays that gave that school first place in the point score for junior high schools. P. S. 184 registered 13 points, P. S. 139 of Manhattan taking second honors with 10. The winners also captured first honors in the 880-yard unlimited weight relay, the team being composed of William Jones, Leroy Jenkins, Albert Schultz and Thompson.

Harry Rosenberg of P. S. 167, Brooklyn, established a new record in the running broad jump 90-pound class for elementary schools, his distance being 7 feet 11 inches, which is 3½ inches higher than the old mark of 7 feet 7½ inches made on Dec. 11, 1926.

Another jumping standard to fall was in the 85-pound class running high jump. Frank Scott of P. S. 9, Brooklyn, cleared the bar at 4 feet 9¾ inches, just one-quarter of an inch above the old record of 4 feet 9½ inches made on Dec. 13, 1924. Incidentally, P. S. 9 took every one of the four places in that event, Witmer Williams placing second, Bernard Valentine third and Anthony Martone fourth.

P. S. 157 Sets Record.

The other record to fall was in the elementary schools 75-pound class 220-yard relay, the P. S. 157 of Manhattan four, Abram Purchase, Edward Gillard, Clarence Jones and Albert Pressey, being clocked in 30 1-5 seconds, 3-5 seconds faster than the former standard made on Dec. 12, 1926, by P. S. 5, Manhattan.

Leo Thompson of P. S. 89, Manhattan, contributed the lone record-equaling feat when he won the 75-pound class 40-yard dash in 5 3-5 seconds, the same time that went down in the record books on Dec. 11, 1926.

The meet was conducted without a hitch, Johnny McHugh, veteran starter, sending off the contestants in the many races.

TWO STILL IN TIE FOR LEAD IN SWIM

Washington and Evander Win Meets in New York Division of P. S. A. L. Series.

The deadlock for first place between the George Washington and Evander Childs High School mermen continued when both aggregations captured their respective engagements in the New York Division of the Public Schools Athletic League series of dual swimming meets yesterday. The Washington lads overwhelmed the Seward Park team, 56-6, taking every first and second place on the program, while Commerce bowed to Evander, 40-22.

There remain only two more weeks of competition, and on Dec. 21 the leaders will meet. Until then it is quite unlikely that either will suffer any setback. The James Monroe representatives trounced the Textile group, 50-12, and took third place undisputedly while Commerce was being beaten. The latter slid into a triple tie for fourth place with De Witt Clinton and Stuyvesant. Theodore Roosevelt was vanquished by De Witt Clinton, 42-20, and Townsend Harris fell before Stuyvesant, 47-15.

Erasmus Hall swept through to a 56-6 triumph over Boys High, and as a result the victors maintained their grasp on the lead-off position in the Brooklyn section. The triple knot for second place was severed somewhat when New Utrecht toppled Brooklyn Tech, 36-26, and the latter went to fourth place, while Manual, which beat Flushing, 37-25, remained in the tie with New Utrecht.

Jefferson Beats Madison.

In the other two meets Thomas Jefferson defeated James Madison, by Jamaica, 43-19. No records were made in the division. Several new marks were established uptown, however. The Evander Childs relay quartet, consisting of McCabe, Krantz, Kelly and Medvell broke the mark of 1:46 for the 200-yard race, doing the distance in 1:44 2-5. John Wicklum of Stuyvesant shattered the 50-yard backstroke event mark with a 0:31 performance.

By beating the Yorkville team, 46-16, the Prospect swimmers now occupy first place in the junior section of the New York group. The victory practically assures the winners the title. Elijah Clark turned back Creston, 44-17; Mangin won from Patrick Henry, 46-15, and the scheduled match between Mount Morris and Forsythe was called off when both teams failed to appear.

Wallace Goes to Second.

In Brooklyn, Henry O'Neil put Lew Wallace into second place by administering to that team a 37-25 defeat. The winners now lead the league. Other results were Seward Park 41, East New York 19; Wingate 36, Pershing 26. In winning from Wallace the Henry O'Neil lads set three records and tied one. Blau established the mark of 0:16 3-5 for the 25-yard swim; the relay team did 0:56 for the event and Bench did the 100-yard unlimited weight race in 1:06 3-5. Schwartz equaled the mark of 0:16 for the 25-yard (90-pound class) race.

The Prospect relay team swam the 100 yards in 0:54 1-5, for a new mark. The standard of 0:17 3-5 for the 25-yard breast stroke was broken three times. Gordon of Mangin first showed the way with 0:16 4-5. Then Bates and Dubinsky from Clark and Prospect respectively did 0:16 2-5. Blackin of Prospect did 0:15 3-5 for the 25-yard free style event, lowering the former mark by one-fifth of a second.

SAVAGE SCHOOL FIVE WINS.

Routs N. Y. U. Dental School Quintet by 65 to 18.

Led by William Denzer, who tallied thirteen points, the Savage School basketball team opened its season with a 65-to-18 victory over the New York University Dental School five on the Savage court yesterday afternoon. The victors led, 27 to 5, at half time.

ROOSEVELT SCORES IN SECTIONAL CHESS

Wins Manhattan and Bronx Division Title by Defeating Seward, 2½ to 1½.

Defeating Seward Park by the score of 2½ to 1½ in the final round at the rooms of the I. L. Rice Progressive Chess Club, the chess team of the Theodore Roosevelt High School yesterday won the championship of the Manhattan and Bronx Division of the Interborough High School Chess League and qualified for the finals, in which two schools from each division will contest for the interborough title.

The Theodore Roosevelt team, consisting of Arnold Denker, David Turetsky, Abraham Hoffman and Lawrence Greene, with S. Bernhardt as alternate, finished with a record of eight matches won and one lost. Seward Park and De Witt Clinton, each 7½ out of 9, tied for second place. Morris, 6-3, was placed fourth.

The summaries:

Ninth Round—Theodore Roosevelt 2½, Seward Park 1½; De Witt Clinton 4, Stuyvesant 0; Morris 3½, Evander Childs ½; Townsend Harris Hall 3, Commerce 1.

In the Brooklyn and Queens division, Erasmus Hall and New Utrecht, each with 7½ matches out of 9, tied for first place, and these two will compete in the interborough final. The divisional championship may be played for in a special match.

Boys High made a strong finish, but had to be content with third place. The Boys High players won seven matches out of nine. There was a triple tie for fourth place among Alexander Hamilton, Thomas Jefferson and Jamaica, each with five won, four lost. Next came Richmond Hill, 3½-5½, followed by Eastern District, 1½-7½, and James Madison, 1-8.

JEFFERSON QUINTET DEFEATS BUSHWICK

LOUGHLIN TRIUMPHS, 28-15

Playing without its captain, Rubin Kaplinsky, the Thomas Jefferson High School basketball team won its fifth consecutive P. S. A. L. victory yesterday when it defeated the Bushwick High School quintet, 29—26 in the Jefferson gymnasium. Belzer, Bushwick forward, took high scoring honors with five field goals and four fouls for a total of fourteen points.

The Jefferson team held a slim lead throughout the contest, leading at half-time by 14—12. It maintained its slight margin during the remainder of the contest. Gotkin and Stelzner tied for scoring honors for the victors, each scoring nine points.

Madison Band Gives Expenses To Red Cross; Pays Own Fare

The sum of $10 was allotted by the P. S. A. L. for traveling expenses of the James Madison High School student band, which played at the twenty-seventh annual elementary schools track and field championship meet at the 102d Combat Engineers Armory yesterday afternoon, but the bandsmen did not use it for that purpose. They contributed it to the Red Cross drive and came by twos and threes, each having paid his own carfare.

MANUAL RIFLE TEAM WINS P. S. A. L. TEST

Takes First of Fall Qualifying Shoots With Total of 974—Morris Next With 936.

PFEFFER LEADING SCORER

Morris Representative Has 180 Points—Rosen, Morris and Schroeder, Manual, Tied at 175.

Seven school teams gathered at the General Wingate rifle range yesterday to compete in the first of the Fall scholastic rifle meets, the qualifying round for the Fall P. S. A. L. championship, with Manual Training High School emerging the winner with a total score of 974. Morris High was runner-up 38 points behind.

Leo Pfeffer and George Rosen, Morris competitors, headed the individual performances. Pfeffer, captain of the Bronx team, tallied 95 points in the prone position and 85 standing to amass a score of 180 out of a possible 200, which easily won for him premier individual honors.

Rosen was forced to share his total of 175 with Frank Schroeder of the Manual team, but according to the rifle rules he gained the second place position due to his higher standing score. In this part of the competition Rosen scored 84 points to 82 for Schroeder.

Only Two Others Reach 170.

Wolff of Stuyvesant and Adams of Manual were the only other participants able to reach the 170 mark.

The team which led the day's shooting was fairly well balanced, ranging from Schroeder's mark of 175 to a 152. Adams followed Schroeder with his 170 points, while the rest of the team scored as follows: Walter Hulsauer, 161; Edward Eriksen, 158; J. A. Lederman, 158, and Ralph Jacobs, 152.

With Morris, the only one of the teams which led in the team scoring during the 1928-29 season, competing in yesterday's trials, much is expected of the teams which will gather for the second half of the qualifying round next week.

Among the teams which usually compile a total score of 1,000 or more to go in action next Saturday morning are Richmond Hill, which last Fall took the championship with a total of 1,067, and Brooklyn Tech, which also compiled 1,067 in the meet but lost due to the relative standing position scoring.

Jamaica Also to Compete.

Also to compete are the Jamaica team, the Spring Standard Bearer Trophy winner, which is virtually the P. S. A. L. Spring championship; Thomas Jefferson and Evander Childs High Schools, both consistent winners last season. The seven schools which compile the best scores in the two qualifying meets will hold a shoot-off for the title.

The Fall season will be devoted mainly to the P. S. A. L. championship, while the Spring season, which starts in early March, has most of the trophy meets.

Baton Rouge Handicap at Jefferson Park Won by Galahad; Patricia Marian Second

REUTER'S GALAHAD TAKES BATON ROUGE

Closes Strongly to Triumph by Four Lengths in Feature at Jefferson Park Track.

PATRICIA MARIAN IS NEXT

Easily Defeats Mix-Up for the Place After Setting the Pace During the Early Running.

Special to The New York Times.

NEW ORLEANS, Dec. 7.—The heavy rain of today and the sloppy track that resulted made for scratches that took most of the competition out of the Baton Rouge Handicap, today's feature at Jefferson Park, and the test that resulted was easy for Phil Reuter's Galahad.

Carrying only 108 pounds, but the top weight at that, Galahad galloped home with four lengths to spare at the end of the mile and seventy yards. Patricia Marian was second, four lengths ahead of Mix-Up, and Sankari brought up the rear, twenty or thirty lengths out of things, after being eased up.

The value to the winner was $1,000, and to get this sum Galahad showed a much better effort than in his two previous races over this course. Some observers incline to the opinion that he is just getting back into racing condition after his long lay-off.

Prior to a race here on Thanksgiving Day, Galahad had not started since last New Year's at the Fair Grounds. When he came back to the races at the opening of this Winter season he ran second behind Paul Bunyan and then finished fourth behind Calf Roper, Yam Toy and Wellet.

While both of those races showed that Reuter had the Prince Galahad gelding in good shape, the performance today was a great improvement.

Georgie Horn was riding Galahad and he gave him a good ride to land the winner's share. Starting slowly, Horn rated Galahad behind Patricia Marian until the mare had tired from her early burst of speed, and then he asked Galahad for an extra notch or two. Reuter's horse drew abreast of the leader without trouble and kept on going away without the necessity of a drive.

Mix-Up, which got third, had more of a chance for the victory than any of the others, as she beat the gate and was in the lead until Patricia Marian took command going to the half-mile pole. The time of the race was 1:50 1-5, and Galahad returned $4.40 for a $2 mutuel ticket. He was the favorite.

Horn scored a consecutive double when he rode Extreme to win the fifth race in a finish that brought the spectators to their feet, as the margin of victory was only a nose.

BROOKLYN EDISON RUN IS WON BY KENDELLEN

Shows Way Over Prospect Park Course—Team Honors to Brooklyn Edison Squad.

Austin Kendellen, New York Edison runner, took first individual honors in the first annual road run held under the auspices of the Brooklyn Edison Club over the Prospect Park course of about four miles yesterday. His time was 20:06 2-5. The meet was closed to members of the Brooklyn and New York Edison Companies and to the Consolidated Gas Company and its affiliated companies.

Despite the fact that the New York Edison team took first and third places, the Brooklyn Edison team managed to defeat it in the team scoring when it compiled a team score of 28 to 41 for the New York team. The Consolidated Gas Company combination was third with 51.

Knight Pilots 135th Winner In Race for Riding Honors

NEW ORLEANS, Dec. 7 (AP).—When Melvin Knight booted Frank Hawley over the mile and a quarter Jefferson Park course today to win the seventh race, he recorded his 135th victory for the season and took a stronger hold on riding honors for 1929.

With but three weeks to go, there is not much chance that any member of the riding brigade will displace Knight as America's premier rider for the year. Knight scored his victories on Middle-Western and Southern tracks with consistent performances that gradually carried him to the front.

RACING DATES SET FOR MARYLAND TURF

Spring Schedule for Three Tracks Announced—To Be Ratified by Commission.

Special to The New York Times.

BALTIMORE, Md., Dec. 7.—Dates for next Spring's races on the Maryland tracks were announced today, subject to ratification by the Maryland Racing Commission. Bowie will have eleven days opening April 1, Havre de Grace twelve days opening April 14, Pimlico twelve days opening April 28. There are no off days in the Spring meetings.

The probable fall dates are: Havre de Grace, Sept. 23-Oct. 4; Laurel, Oct 7-Nov. 1; Pimlico Nov. 4-15; Bowie, Nov. 7-19.

The Maryland Jockey Club has set Friday, May 9, for the renewal of the $50,000 Preakness Stakes, the first big feature of the season exclusively for 3-year-olds.

If the Kentucky Jockey Club adheres to past dates, the Kentucky Derby is slated to be renewed at Churchill Downs on Saturday, May 17. As in the past, starters in both Spring classics will have an interval of eight days between races.

The open dates in the fall are Monday, Oct. 6 and Monday, Nov. 3. During the past season there were five open dates on the schedule, three of them in a row.

Timonium and Marlboro half-mile tracks and fair associations have also fixed dates. Timonium is scheduled to begin Labor Day, Sept. 1. Marlboro will follow, Sept. 9 to 15. Cumberland, following its usual dates, will run from Aug. 26 to 30.

If Hagerstown should not hold its fair during the third week in September, there will be no racing between the closing of Marlboro and the opening at Havre de Grace.

RADICAL RULE CHANGES FOR HOCKEY OPPOSED

Dandurand Says Game Must Not Be Tampered With to Point of Distortion.

MONTREAL, Dec. 7 (Canadian Press).—"Undoubtedly changes made are eliciting much favorable as well as adverse comment. Even changes to a radical type will not topple hockey from the esteem of its followers. It is well established in a professional and amateur way in Canada, but we must not tamper with it to the point of distortion," Leo Dandurand, secretary-treasurer of the Canadien Club and its representative on the board of governors of the National Hockey Club, said today in answer to queries regarding the new rules.

"Many contend that the manner of play in the past and the rules bred its present popularity and would retain it," Dandurand continued. "The game should not be allowed to deteriorate. The league should not be swayed by the fanciful ideas of a few, whose main objects are to create added interest every year by making changes in the rule book.

"The real test of the new rules cannot be gauged from a playing or financial standpoint. That will only come in late January, when the race for both sections will straighten out for the drive to the stretch."

MEADOWLARK DAWN BEST IN DOG SHOW

Champion Grand Beagle Leads Her Breed and Sporting Variety at Trenton.

INGLEHURST MARIE IS 2D

Gordon Setter Is Runner-Up—Eva of Bratenahl Wins in Working Dog Group.

By HENRY R. ILSLEY.

Special to The New York Times.

TRENTON, N. J., Dec. 7.—Champion Meadow Lark Dawn, the grand beagle bitch bred and owned by Louis Batjer of New Brunswick, N. J., was proclaimed best dog of all those benched at the annual two day exhibition of the Trenton Kennel Club, which came to a close tonight in the Trenton Armory.

A large crowd of enthusiasts surrounded the big ring for the judging of the variety groups and for the best of show.

Meadow Lark Dawn went to the top of her breed on the opening day and swept through the sporting variety group this evening. She is a lovely little hound and is a Meadow Lark Toller out of Meadow Lark Bridesmaid. She showed to perfection on both the occasions she was in the ring and the award was most popular.

Competition Is Keen.

There was a long and intensive competition among the winners in the sporting group, and each time this group is judged there is plenty of evidence of the wisdom of the decision to split it in two. George A. Flammer took a long time in sorting them out and finally placed the beagle at the top. Second was the Gordon setter, Charles T. Inglee's Ch. Inglehurst Marie.

The working dog group was not much to become excited about, and Dr. Charles J. MacNulty selected the Great Dane bitch, John K. Howell's Eva of Bratenahl, for the honors, giving second to the Old English sheep dog, Walter J. Graham's Little Bo Peep.

The terriers presented several problems for Robert D. Hartshorne, the competition finally narrowing down to the Scottish terrier ch. Ballantrae Wendy, owned by Mr. and Mrs. Caswell Barrie of Scarsdale, N. Y., and the Airedale terrier bitch Willinez Lady May, owned by the Willinez Weather Kennels, and the former carried off the trophy for best of the group.

Best among the toys was that outstanding Pekingese, Ch. Rajah of Hesketh Wu Ku, owned by Mrs. Harry J. Sears of Milburn, N. J., which carried off the cup in the groups, second going to the Japanese spaniel Keuwanna Kitishima, owned by the Keuwanna Kennels.

Only three showed for the trophy among the non-sporting dogs, the highest honors being carried away by the lovely Chow Chow, Ch. Ledgelands Solo Chink, owned by Mrs. Davis Wagstaff of Tuxedo Park, N. Y., second being the Boston terrier, Ch. Haggerty Sensation II, owned by Mrs. L. B. Daley.

Fox Terriers Draw Few.

The wire-haired fox terriers, most popular today in all the canine kingdom, for instance, mustered scarcely a corporal's guard for young Philip L. Bondy.

Among the bitches there was only a puppy, while four dogs were in the ring in the several classes. Best went to Dr. P. G. Hood's Good Flanna Speedy.

Cairns also had a small entry and the Tapscot Kennels of Wilton, Conn., swept through, winning in dogs with Deacon of Tapscot, in bitches with Hoex of Tyver o'Tapscot and taking best of winners with the Deacon. Best of the breed went to the same owner's noted champion, Knipton Dean of Tapscot.

Dearth of entries among the Schnauzers was notable and the famous Miniature ch. Cuno of Wollaton, owned by Mrs. Mary C. Kearns of Wynnewood, Pa., repeated his Atlantic City victory by being awarded best of breed.

Shepherds were among the strongest breeds of the show and honors were well divided. McClue Halley showed the winning dog for the Giralda Farms in Hussan Vom Bodman, and Selwyn Harris, the judge, placed him over the winning bitch, the homebred Tinkle of Willowgate, owned by the Willowgate Kennels of Princeton, N. J. Best of breed went to that well known champion, Iso Von Bergholtz, owned by the Cosalta Kennels of Miss Marie J. Leary of Greenwich, Conn.

Scratched—Brillante, Chatter Black, Braggadocio, Eloise, Lucky Hit, Fleeting Fire, Germaine Chauvelot.

Maiden's Tryst got off well, had good speed and followed the pace to the stretch, where she ran into the lead and, drawing out, won handily. Salona was rushed up on the outside and led to the final furlong, where she tired slightly. Bridegroom was well up all the way and ran a good race. Little Gyp saved ground all the way and finished well. Dr. Fred did not like the going. David Bone, off poorly, made a bid around the turn, but weakened in the stretch.

Owners—1, J. Howard; 2, Jones Stock Farm; 3, C. Graffagnini; 4, Knebelkamp & Morris; 5, Basil Manor Stable; 6, Mrs. Clyde Phillips; 7, C. A. Coyle; 8, Mrs. M. Wolff.

Scratched—Jean, King Cherokee.

Blameless, racing in best form and showing a liking for the going, came wide in the stretch and closed gamely, to win going away. Red Mountain had high speed, saved ground and held on gamely. Meridianese was kept out in the best going and was well up all the way. Justina was hard ridden, but stopped fast in the final furlong. La Golondrina is worth remembering. Coreopsis had no chance with the start.

Owners—1, Mrs. J. S. Sullivan; 2, R. C. Stable; 3, Black Dot Stable; 4, G. Collins; 5, J. Howard; 6, Graceland Stock Farm; 7, J. R. Clark.

8734 FOURTH RACE—The Baton Rouge Handicap; purse $1,500; all ages; one mile and seventy yards. Start fair; won easily; place same. Winner, ch. g., 4, by Prince Galahad—Claimorisa. Trainer, Phil Reuter. Time—0:24⅘, 0:50⅘, 1:16⅘, 1:45⅘, 1:50⅘.

Scratched—Lord Braedalbane, Calf Roper, Old Slip, Longus, Uncommon Gold and Wellet.

Galahad, showing big improvement over his recent race and well handled, ran into the lead when ready and won galloping. Patricia Marian, away fast, showed fine speed and was next best. Mixup beat the gate, kept close to the pace and ran a good race. Sankari had speed for three furlongs, but then drifted back and was eased up in the stretch.

Owners—1, P. Reuter; 2, G. Collins; 3, Three D's Stock Farm; 4, R. C. Stable.

8735 FIFTH RACE—Purse $1,200; allowances; 3-year-olds and upward; six furlongs. Start good; won driving; place same. Winner, ch. g., 7, by Ultimatum—Lydia A. Trainer, J. G. Demarest. Time—0:24⅘, 0:50, 1:17⅘.

Scratched—Patricia Marian.

Extreme, going greatly improved form, followed the pace to the stretch, ran into the lead and held on well. Gold Mint was off in a tangle and suffered interference, came to the outside and finished with a rush, and would have won in another stride. Double Heart had plenty of speed, but weakened badly in the final sixteenth. Stupendous came very fast at the end. First Mission tired. Bramabiau was outrun.

Owners—1, J. G. Demarest; 2, Mrs. R. Pollard; 3, Three D's Stock Farm; 4, R. F. Curran; 5, Miss Blanche Watson; 6, D. Komie; 7, J. H. O'Malley.

—	Marlboro	102	2	1	3²	4	4	4	4	Cramer	....	....	....	3.95

Scratched—Comet, Redcliffe and Laundryman.

Ruane, nicely handled, was kept close to the pace, moved up very fast turning into the stretch and, closing gamely, held on well to win. Sanford was taken wide around the first turn and was rated to the final furlong, where he closed very fast. Alto opened a wide lead in the first half mile, but weakened fast at the end. Marlboro dropped far out of it early, but closed gamely.

Owners—1, Valley Lake Stable; 2, D. Komie; 3, Mrs. J. W. Smith; 4, G. Collins.

8737 SEVENTH RACE—Purse $1,000; claiming; 3-year-olds and upward; one mile and a quarter. Start good; won driving; place easily. Winner, b. g., 5, by Boniface—Miss Mooney. Trainer, E. McCuan. Time—0:25⅘, 0:51⅘, 1:17⅘, 1:47⅘, 2:14.

Scratched—Sun Rajah, Letter Six, Sligo Branch, Open Go Shut, Torch Boy, Gay Lothario, Shasta Bally, Bashful Bean, Sir Leonid, Alita Allen, La Paloma.

Frank Hawley was rated off the pace for a mile, then moved up fast and, taking the lead, held Torcher safe. The latter made a game effort and had no mishap. Vole slipped through on the inside and ran a good race. Bigot tired badly. Thistle Princess had early speed, but stopped.

Owners—1, E. McCuan; 2, E. E. Major; 3, C. Lang; 4, Mrs. J. Sciaccaluga; 5, G. F. Jenkins.

GEORGETTI-DEBAETS WIN SIX-DAY RACE

last, all the other teams having been withdrawn from the race, either through injury or, as was the case last night, because they were so far behind.

When the final hour of sprints began promptly the two leading teams of Georgetti and Debaets and Letourner and Brocardo went along more or less easily, keeping a close watch on each other.

It was in the big jam that followed the fifth sprint and went on throughout the next two dashes that Georgetti got the jump on the Red Devils and with Debaets gained the lap that put his team in the lead from which it could not be dislodged.

In the same jam Spencer and Deulberg, Hill and Walthour, Richili and Rieger and Beckman and Winter also lapped the field, but only the lap gained by Spencer and Deulberg was a misfortune for the Red Devils.

Partners Are Shifted.

In the first sprint of the final hour an unusual shifting of partners took place, Georgetti replacing Debaets and Deulberg riding in place of Spencer after the first few laps. The sprint was won by Beckman, with Deulberg, Rieger and Linari finishing behind him in that order.

Spencer took the second sprint, leading the pack from the start, with Debaets, Hill and Horder finishing in the order named.

Beckman took the third sprint, followed by Linari, Brocardo and Rieger, and the crowd set up a roar as a jam seemed about to get under way. But the roar died as riders jockeyed at an easy pace around the oval for the fourth sprint, which was won by Georgetti, who promptly went out in the first real jam of the sprints.

The crowd went into an uproar that completely drowned out the announcement of the fifth sprint, which McNamara won in the jam with Letourner and Georgetti right behind him. As the most desperate jamming continued the crowd paid little attention to the sprint winners, concentrating on the wild riding of the scattered field.

During the jam the French Red Devils were caught and lapped by Georgetti and Debaets, who broke the first place tie and went into the lead. Spencer and Deulberg and Hill and Walthour also lapped the field to tie for the next place with the Frenchmen. Beckman and Winter and Richili and Rieger, too, lapped the field.

In the eleventh and twelfth sprint jams the team Richili and Rieger gained a lap. The jamming continued without abatement, and in the thirteenth sprint Horder and Linari gained a lap.

Spencer Draws Fine.

Spencer came under the first publicly announced displeasure of Referee Kramer just after the fifteenth sprint, when Georgetti flashed past the American sprint champion to win. It was announced that Spencer had been fined $25 for foul riding.

During the seventeenth sprint the team of Horder-Linari gained a lap while the fans cheered wildly. Linari and Horder appeared to have no chance to win, but they were doing a great job of riding.

Georgetti's riding was a marvel of efficiency, with never a wasted motion, and his ability to catch his man when he went after him was not to be denied. The first let-up in the jamming came about ten minutes from the end, when McNamara and Richili went down in a tangle just after rounding the Ninth Avenue turn. Both were back on the track within a few minutes and the jamming went on as before.

Belloni flashed out to win the twenty-fourth sprint of the final hour with only three minutes left of the race. Then Spencer hunched over his wheel and he and Deulberg went out in a wild ride to gain a lap before the race ended, but when Georgetti began to show his power the task proved hopeless, and the crack the gun showed Debaets riding ahead of Spencer to win the race.

Results of Final Sprints.

The results of the final sprints follow:

First—Beckman, Deulberg, Rieger, Linari.
Second—Spencer, Debaets, Hill, Horder.
Third—Beckman, Linari, Brocardo, Rieger.
Fourth—Georgetti, Beckman, Deulberg, McNamara.
Fifth—McNamara, Letourner, Georgetti, Rieger.
Sixth—Deulberg, Georgetti, Letourner, Rieger.
Seventh—Deulberg, Georgetti, Letourner, Beckman.

Philadelphia Loses to New York, 4-3, in Lockett Squash Racquets Play in Boston

NEW YORK IN LEAD IN SQUASH RACQUETS

Beats Philadelphia Team, 4-3, in Opening Play for Lockett Trophy at Boston.

POOL LOSES HARD BATTLE

National Amateur Champion Beaten by Sullivan of Philadelphia—Boston Clashes Twice Today.

By ALLISON DANZIG.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, Dec. 7.—Lawrence Pool 2d, national amateur squash racquets champion, bowed before Neil Sullivan, Philadelphia, in one of the most furiously fought matches on record as the New York representatives defeated Philadelphia to-night in the opening round of the inter-city matches for the Lockett Trophy at the Harvard Club.

Representing the most formidable array of talent that has been mustered in the five years' history of this event, with two former national champions as well as Pool in the line-up, the defending team barely eked out a 4-3 victory over the Pennsylvanians.

Tomorrow, Boston will play both New York and Philadelphia and the city winning the most individual matches in the round robin affair will be declared the winner.

Herbert N. Rawlins Jr., 1928 champion; W. Palmer Dixon, titleholder in 1925 and 1926; George Debevoise and Lathrope Haskins, all recent graduates of Harvard, scored for New York. The other winners for Philadelphia were Sydney P. Clark and John Haynes.

Debevoise Decides Issue.

Debevoise turned in the deciding point when, with the score tied at 3-all, he defeated Roy R. Coffin at 15—12, 17—16, 15—18, 13—15, 15—11.

Sullivan's victory over Pool was registered in five games after the former lawn tennis protégé of William Tilden had lost the first two chapters, both of which went to extra points. The final reckoning was 15—18, 17—18, 15—13, 15—10, 15—10.

In justice to Pool, it must be said that he went into the court less than half an hour after arriving from New York. Along with Debevoise and Haskins, the national champion left at 1 o'clock in the afternoon and did not reach Boston until after 6.

If the long train ride had any effect on Pool's game it was not evident in his play and he stated after the match that he had played much better than he had hoped to, certainly better than he did a week ago when he lost to Ralph Powers in the Gold Squash racquet tournament at the Rockaway Hunting Club.

The defeat of the champion can be explained only by the fact that Sullivan rose to magnificent heights and met his opponent's withering attack with so much speed of foot and stroke, such remarkable steadiness and so many superb corner and drop shots that Pool had to yield after having victory almost within his grasp in the third game.

Final Match Is Spectacular.

The handfull of spectators who remained to watch this match were amply rewarded for delaying their dinner hour by one of the most exciting and spectacular struggles ever witnessed on the Harvard Club courts. From start to finish it was a battle royal, with both men traveling at a terrific clip and never slackening pace for a moment in the furious onslaught.

So volcanic was the play in the narrow confines of the court that both men made most of their strokes off balance as they hurled themselves around each other and from back to front wall and return. The gets on both sides were almost unbelievable at times and in this respect Sullivan was a little the more sensational.

From the third game on his defense was so adamant and his control so infallible that it was almost impossible for Pool to make a kill regardless of how much he mixed his game.

The champion played a more varied game than is his custom. As a rule, he achieves his ends with pure, unadulterated speed, as he did in defeating Rawlins in the final of the national tourney last year. But speed alone was not enough to win this match, and as it turned out speed, fearful low drives down the alley, together with changes of pace and corner shots, were not enough either.

Sullivan Has Control.

Sullivan could hit almost as hard and with better control, though he did not play as close to the tin on his straight drives as did Pool, and he was much more successful with his corner shots and his delicate drop shots. After losing those two desperately fought first games, the former Lehigh youth showed his great lasting powers by rising to his greatest heights in the final three games.

Pool made beautiful uphill fights in the third and fourth chapters, only to falter at the end, but in the final game he never had a look-in, as Sullivan gained a 7—1 lead, largely with his splendid service to the forehand, and went to 10—3.

This battle was only one of many hard-fought engagements. Dixon, who was persuaded to renounce hard racquets temporarily to return to his first love, gave a masterful exhibition of resourceful, heady position play in curbing the more impetuous strokes of C. Sewall Clark at 15—9, 15—4, 15—13.

THE SUMMARIES.

Neil Sullivan, Philadelphia, defeated J. Lawrence Pool 2d, 15—18, 17—18, 15—13, 15—10, 15—10; Herbert N. Rawlins Jr., New York, defeated Joseph Keefe, 15—10, 15—17, 15—10, 15—6; George Debevoise, New York, defeated Roy R. Coffin, 15—12, 17—16, 15—18, 13—15, 15—17; W. Palmer Dixon, New York, defeated C. Sewall Clark, 15—9, 15—4, 15—13; John Haynes, Philadelphia, defeated F. K. Keenan, 15—6, 10—15, 15—4, 12—15, 15—9; Sydney P. Clark, Philadelphia, defeated Lee Norris, 15—10, 15—12, 4—15, 8—15, 15—13; Lathrop Haskins, New York, defeated K. C. Kennedy, 15—13, 15—5, 15—8.

Haverford Elects Captain.

HAVERFORD, Pa., Dec. 7.—Charles H. Penneypacker of Ardmore, Pa., was elected to the captaincy of Haverford College's 1930 soccer team here today. Penneypacker has been a regular on Coach McPete's team for the last two years. He held down the centre half berth during the past season. Frank W. Speller of Pittsburgh, Pa., who has been assistant manager for the last year, succeeded to the managership. A. Craig Succop, also of Pittsburgh, was elected assistant manager.

Sets English Billiards Mark Of 3,262 Points in One Break

LONDON, Dec. 7 (AP).—Setting a new record of 3,262 points in one break, Walter Lindrum of Australia today won his English billiards match with Willie Smith of England, 26,689 points to 20,580. The match lasted two weeks. The former record for most points from one break was set at 2,732 by Smith.

English billiards differs greatly from the American game. As played abroad, with larger tables, billiards made off certain balls count two points, others three points, as opposed to the American system of counting one point for every billiard regardless of how it is made.

TENNIS BODY SEEKS VIEWS ON OPEN PLAY

Questionnaire Sent by U. S. L. T. A. to Members Revealed at Meeting Here.

ASKS AMATEURS' REACTION

Progress Made in Plans for Tourney Awaiting Change in Code by International Federation.

The proposed open tennis tournament under sanction of the United States Lawn Tennis Association took more formal form yesterday when the executive committee received the report of the open tournament committee at a session in the Hotel Vanderbilt. The U. S. L. T. A., of course, already has gone on record as favoring the tournament and has taken the most necessary step, that of seeking an amendment to the international code whereby amateur and professional players can compete against each other for a prize.

The report of the committee submitted yesterday by Chairman Louis B. Dailey showed the progress that had been made and the further effort that was being put forth to ascertain the interest held among amateur players in the proposed tournament.

Chairman Dailey disclosed that he had written a letter to all of the affiliated associations outlining the plans for the tournament and had, as well, sent to every amateur player a questionnaire by which it is hoped to gain the reaction of the individuals regarding the open play.

British Seek Restriction.

The report also disclosed the fact that the British Tennis Association intended to propose an amendment to the international rule amendment sought by the United States Lawn Tennis Association. The British body will seek to restrict the staging of the open tournaments, proposing that only one open event be held in each country each year.

The questionnaire which already has been sent to the members of the U. S. L. T. A. gives a hint as to the time when the tournament will be conducted, if the International Tennis Federation approves the United States amendment, and also indicates three sites from among which the choice would be made for the staging of the play.

The questionnaire asks if September of next year would be acceptable and further on mentions the West Side Tennis Club, the Germantown Cricket Club and the Longwood Cricket Club, thus leaving the inference that one of these three would be likely to have the honor of holding the first pro-amateur championship.

How far advanced the plans for the tournament have gone also is indicated by the question of paying expenses for foreign and resident professionals to the site of the tournament.

The International Tennis Federation meeting, at which the proposal to permit amateurs to compete with profesionals for a prize will come up, will be held in Paris on March 21 next, and while not wishing to anticipate action by that body, the U. S. L. T. A. nevertheless feels that all of the details attending the tournament should be completed, so that if the International body's ruling is favorable there would be no delay in preparing for the open.

The executive committee also announced the appointment of Day Kimball of London, who is the U. S. L. T. A.'s representative in Europe, as a delegate to the International Federation's meeting, and one purpose of the questionnaire is to put the executive committee in a position to instruct Mr. Kimball on the manner he should vote at the Paris session.

The first query of the questionnaire is significant. The question reads: "Should the United States Lawn Tennis Association hold an open championship in 1930 regardless of what action is taken by the International Federation on the U. S. L. T. A.'s proposed amendment to the rules?"

Prizes Barred at Present.

Under the present interpretation of the U. S. L. T. A. on the international code it is held that an open tournament can be staged here, but that no prizes can be offered. The amendment seeks to make the giving of prizes possible. The significance of the first question therefore is that in the event the International Federation failed to approve the U. S. L. T. A.'s proposed amendment, an open tournament might be held nevertheless, if a sufficient number of members of the U. S. L. T. A. showed a desire for that by their answers to the questionnaires.

The question of the professionals sending a real champion into competition against the amateurs in the proposed open championship also is brought up in question 3, which asks, "If an open championship is held, should a professional championship be held by the professional tennis associations, and if so, when should it be held in relation to the men's national championship tournament?"

There are ten questions in the questionnaire, all but those quoted having to do with the paying of expenses, reimbursement for same and the qualifications of players, arrangements, &c.

The executive committee also voted to approve the recommendation of the Davis Cup Committee that the United States should challenge for the Davis Cup in the American zone next year and also voted to accept the challenge from England for the Wightman Cup next year.

Frank Taberski, Defending Champion in World's Pocket Billiard Tourney.

TITLE CUE TOURNEY STARTS TOMORROW

Field of Eight Will Compete in the World's Pocket Billiard Championship at Detroit.

TABERSKI TO DEFEND CROWN

Greenleaf Leading Contender in the Series — Rudolph, Lauri, Natalie and Camp Among Contestants.

The world's championship pocket billiard tournament, the first title cue event of the season, will start at Detroit tomorrow night with eight of the greatest exponents of the game competing.

Frank Taberski of Schenectady, N. Y., who has been in the pocket billiard spotlight for more than two decades, is the defending champion, with Ralph Greenleaf of New York, former world's titleholder, as the chief contender among the others in the field.

Twenty-eight contests are on the schedule in this tourney which will take place in the Recreation Building, Detroit, continuing through to Dec. 18. Exclusive of gate receipts, the players will share in $15,000, while first place will be worth $8,500 in cash. The total purse is expected to exceed $30,000.

As a result of the four sectional tournaments conducted by the National Billiard Association of America, the four winners, who qualified through a series of genuine eliminations, will see action against four players who qualified without tests on account of their work in the last title tournament.

The official list of entrants follows:

Frank Taberski of Schenectady, N. Y., defending champion.

Erwin Rudolph of Chicago, former world's champion.

Pasquale Natalie of Detroit, veteran championship contender.

Marcel Camp of Detroit, winner of the Northern sectional tournament which was played in Minneapolis.

Onofrio Lauri of Brooklyn, winner of the Eastern sectional tournament which was played in Baltimore.

Spencer Livsey of Los Angeles, winner of the Western sectional tournament, which was played in Los Angeles.

Joseph J. McCann of Jacksonville, Fla., winner of the Southern sectional tournament, which was played in Kansas City.

Despite the fact that Taberski has proved to be an exceptional strategist, Greenleaf has been made the favorite to win the championship, mainly on the form he has shown this season. The fight is expected to be between Taberski and Greenleaf, who virtually have dominated pocket billiards since 1916.

RUN OF 135 FEATURES TABERSKI'S VICTORY

Frank Taberski, world's champion, won the 1,500 point 12-block pocket billiard match with Charles Seaback at the Strand Billiard Academy yesterday when he captured the eleventh and twelfth blocks.

In the afternoon Taberski triumphed over Seabeck, 123-61 in eight innings. The victor made an unfinished high run of 80 while Seaback compiled a cluster of 38. In the evening block, Taberski was victorious by a 122-45 margin. Taberski started this match off with his run of 55, and this coupled with his unfinished run of the first contest, made a total straight string of 135. Seaback's high run was 28.

Taberski took nine out of the twelve blocks played. Seaback's final total for the match was 1,077. The victor also compiled the highest run for the entire contest making 135 while Seaback's best string for the match was 69.

LAYTON IS WINNER IN 3-CUSHION PLAY

Divides Last Two Blocks, but Beats Cochran by Score of 600 to 530.

Johnny Layton, world's champion, and Welker Cochran divided the final two blocks of their three-cushion billiard match with the diamonds covered at Dwyer's Broadway Academy yesterday, but Layton won the match, 600 points to 530.

In the afternoon Cochran triumphed, 72 to 50, in 62 innings, each having a high run of 6. At night, Layton won, 50 to 24, in 46 innings. His high run was 6 and Cochran's 5.

NEW BEDFORD DEFEATS PROVIDENCE IN SOCCER

Triumphs, 2-0, in Game for Second Place—Losers' Goalie Is Knocked Out.

Special to The New York Times.

NEW BEDFORD, Mass., Dec. 7.—In a soccer game in which second place was at stake in the Atlantic Coast League, New Bedford defeated Providence today, 2 to 0.

One goal was obtained in each half, the first on a penalty kick taken by Montgomerie when a hand foul was called on J. Barrie of Providence. Florie scored the second, a lightning drive from close range. Kenneway, goalie for the losers, was knocked out fifteen minutes from the end of play when a hard drive from Chedgzoy struck him in the stomach.

The line-up:

New Bedford (2).		Providence (0).

PHILADELPHIA BEATS NEW YORK AT SOCCER

Triumphs by 6-4 for Third Year in Succession on Snow-Covered Field at Englewood.

ENGLEWOOD, N. J., Dec. 7.—For the third year in succession victory rested with Philadelphia in the annual intercity soccer match with New York on the grounds of the Englewood Field Club today. The final score favored Philadelphia by 6 to 4. The field was covered with snow, making the footing decidedly uncertain. The opposing sides represented the clubs affiliated with the Field Club Soccer League of New York and New Jersey and the Philadelphia Cricket League.

The line-up:

Philadelphia (6).		New York (4).

GARDEN TO REOPEN TO BOXING THIS WEEK

Christmas Fund Card Tomorrow Will Find Scott and Von Porat in Feature.

DEMPSEY WILL REFEREE

McLarnin and Goldstein to Box on Friday—Keen Interest Taken in the Matches.

By JAMES P. DAWSON.

Madison Square Garden, which echoed through the past week to the excitement of the six-day bicycle race, will resound this week to the thud of the padded glove and the shout of the boxing fan. Two ring carnivals have been arranged.

Tomorrow night The New York American Christmas Fund will conduct its annual carnival for the purpose of realizing funds with which to make the needy happier over the Yuletide period. On Friday night Ruby Goldstein and Jimmy McLarnin are to clash in one of the greatest "natural" bouts the ring today offers.

For tomorrow night's Christmas Fund bouts an attractive card has been arranged. Otto Von Porat, Chicago's Norwegian heavyweight, and Phil Scott, English pretender to the throne abdicated by Gene Tunney, are to collide in the twelve-round feature. Maxie Rosenbloom, Harlem's recognized contender for the light-heavyweight title, and Yale Okun, east sider, are paired for twelve rounds in a twin feature.

Georgie Hoffman, Yorkville heavyweight has been matched with Marty Gallagher, Washington, D. C., for a ten-round bout, and in two four-round events Paul Bianchi, Argentine invader, will engage Jerry Pavelec, and Bill Daring will oppose Eddie Steele, English boxer.

Contributing appeal to the occasion, from the sentimental as well as the box-office standpoint, is the fact that Jack Dempsey, former heavyweight champion of the world, will be seen for the first time hereabouts in the rôle of referee. Dempsey has been licensed by the State Athletic Commission and is expected to officiate in the Von Porat-Scott match.

The clash between Goldstein and McLarnin on Friday night promises ring fireworks. Although the tickets have not as yet been offered for public sale, there is every indication of a capacity crowd attending the match, so great is the interest.

HARTKOPP BEATS DANIELS.

Young German Light-Heavyweight Defeats Englishman in Berlin.

Wireless to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BERLIN, Dec. 7.—Gipsy Daniels of England, who knocked out Max Schmeling, Hans Breitenstraeter, Paul Samson-Koerner and Hein Domgeoergen, was defeated tonight by a young, promising light-heavyweight, Helmut Hartkopp, and was saved from a knockout only by his advantage of seventeen pounds and greater size.

Hartkopp, who is 22 years old, has a real fighting heart, and attacked Daniels incessantly over the whole distance of eight rounds, driving Daniels into every corner. The victor has had so far seventeen fights, of which he won fifteen, and never was floored.

Previous to his departure from Berlin, Joe Jacobs, Schmeling's manager, told the boxing promoter, Paul Damsky, that in case Hartkopp defeated Daniels he should bring Hartkopp to the United States, for which purpose Jacobs deposited money for two tickets.

Jacobs intends to introduce Hartkopp to the boxing world at Atlantic City Feb. 22, Washington's Birthday, the same night Schmeling will appear in the ring. Hartkopp undoubtedly will make a good impression because he is good at give and take. Damsky and Hartkopp expect to sail on the same boat as Schmeling early in January.

JAMAICA QUINTET LOSES.

Bows to Bay Shore High School Team by 29 to 23.

STRIBLING VICTOR ON CARNERA'S FOUL

Italian Disqualified for Hitting Rival After Bell Ends 7th Round at Paris.

MEN BOX ON EVEN TERMS

Carnera Floored in Sixth, but Lands Telling Punches — Foul Blow Knocks Stribling Down.

PARIS, Dec. 7 (AP).—William L. (Young) Stribling, Macon (Ga.) heavyweight, won on a foul in the seventh round of his return match with Primo Carnera, six-foot-ten-inch Venetian carpenter, tonight. Carnera, who recently won on a foul from Stribling at London, was disqualified for hitting the Georgian after the bell ending the seventh round had sounded.

It was a disappointing ending to a fight in which Stribling found the big carpenter no set-up to be brushed aside when he pleased. Carnera went down for a short count in the sixth round, but otherwise just about held his own with his American rival, whom he outweighed by some eighty-five pounds.

Italian Tries Rushing.

Stribling easily outboxed his giant opponent in the first two rounds, but his blows did not seem to worry Carnera. At the start of the third the Italian tried to rush Stribling, but the American was too clever to let him do much damage, evading most of his blows and returning sharp lefts to the head and stomach. These blows failed to shake Carnera seriously. The Italian worked his way into clinches and leaned heavily on his slighter opponent. Carnera got in one good wallop just as the round ended, landing sharply on the side of Stribling's head.

Carnera tried another rush to start the fourth round, but was sent back to the ropes by the hardest blow Stribling landed during the fight. They exchanged blows freely in the intervals between frequent clinches to bring the round to an even end.

Stribling landed a straight left on Carnera's jaw to open the fifth round. The wallop enraged the big Italian and he cut loose with a series of furious punches which had Stribling backing up. The American landed with both hands on Carnera's head and body often enough to keep the round even.

Carries Fight to Carnera.

The American appeared anxious for a quick triumph at the start of the sixth round and carried the fight to Carnera. In the close range fighting Stribling landed a hard blow in the pit of Carnera's stomach, sending him to his knees. The Italian rose immediately. Stribling looked none too comfortable all through the round, and most of his blows seemed to lack weight.

The seventh round opened with another series of clinches, the American apparently reserving his strength for a telling punch. He made the Italian wince once with a body blow. Just as the round ended he got in two more hard wallops at Carnera's midsection. These punches enraged the Italian and he rushed Stribling after the gong had sounded, landing a hard blow to the head which sent Stribling to the canvas. This action drew a storm of hoots from the crowd and caused Carnera's disqualification.

BRADDOCK KNOCKS OUT WARREN IN 2D ROUND

Jersey City Heavyweight Scores Four Knockdowns Before Chicagoan Is Counted Out.

James J. Braddock of Jersey City knocked out Jake Warren of Chicago in 42 seconds of the second round of the main six-round bout at the New Ridgewood Grove last night. Braddock dropped Warren four times before the Chicagoan was counted out. Braddock weighed 182½ and Warren 189. A crowd of 4,000 saw the bouts.

Billy Brown, 146, of Laurel Hill, floored Joe Manny, 139½, of Ossining, in two minutes and nine seconds of the first round of the six-round semi-final. Manny substituted for Jack Graham.

Johnny King, 126½, of Brownsville, defeated Sid Silas, 129½, of South Brooklyn, in four rounds. David Brown, 117, of Brownsville, knocked out Ivan Hawes, 114½, of Harlem, in one minute four seconds of the second round. Sonny Schwartz, 146, of the Bronx, outpointed Teddy Martin, 141¼, of Bay Ridge.

Bruno Sale, 174½, of North Pelham, dropped Eddie Warren, 169½, of Chicago, brother of Jake, in two minutes and nine seconds of the first round. Joe Marks, 116½, of the east side, outboxed Lew Wein, 115, of the west side. Eddie Cerda, 122½, defeated Freddie Raymond, 121½. Willie Hines, 133½, of Chicago, outpointed Joe La Fuci, also 133½, of the Bronx.

TELL GAINS DECISION.

Outpoints Rodrigues in the Feature Bout at Brooklyn Armory.

Benny Tell gained the verdict over Mike Rodrigues in the feature ten-round bout at the Fourteenth Regiment Armory, Brooklyn, last night. Tell, who represented the naval militia, weighed 120 pounds, while Rodrigues, from the 106th Infantry, weighed in at 116 pounds. In the second ten-rounder Jackie Aldare, 157 pounds, of the 106th Infantry, defeated Mule Brown, 155 pounds, of the 369th Infantry. Sammy White, 138 pounds, of the 369th Infantry, received the decision over Guy Mastrion, 132 pounds, of the Fourteenth Infantry in the final ten.

In the six-rounder Young Russo, Fourteenth Infantry, defeated Larry Di Palma, also Fourteenth Infantry, while the scheduled four-rounder ended in the opening session when Jerry Parsio, Fourteenth Infantry, knocked out Eddie Prince, United States Army.

BOSTON, Dec. 7 (AP).—The Boston Bruins downed the Detroit Crougars, 2 to 1, tonight in a furious National League hockey contest. The visitors spotted the champions a tally during the first five minutes, when Hal Hicks and Reg Noble permitted Dutch Gainor to ambel through them and blaze away at Goalie Beveridge for a score. With about three minutes left in the period, Dit Clapper and Gainor broke through the same Detroit defense men and the former was able to tally Gainor's pass-out from the backboard. Detroit scored in the second period.

ENTERPRISE IS NAME OF ONE CUP YACHT

Aldrich-Vanderbilt Contender to Defend Famous Trophy Called After Navy Schooner.

A TRADITION DISREGARDED

Name Is First Since 1887 to Contain More Than Eight Letters —Work Advances.

By SHANNON CORMACK.

The yacht designed by W. Starling Burgess and now building at the Herreshoff yards at Bristol, R. I., for the Winthrop W. Aldrich-Harold S. Vanderbilt syndicate for the defense of the America's Cup will be named Enterprise, the name being that of a famous schooner in the American Navy which distinguished itself in action against the Barbary pirates.

In selecting Enterprise for the name of their boat the members of the syndicate of boat No. 4, as she is officially designated, have swept tradition aside in that they have not selected a name of eight letters, as has been the case of all the cup defenders since 1887.

Not only is boat No. 4 the first to be named of the four cup defenders that are now building, but work on Enterprise is more advanced than on any of the others. The keel has been laid, framework is almost completed and the hull is ready for plating. Sails are cut and it is expected that the Aldrich-Vanderbilt sloop will be the first of the yacht to be off the ways.

Others Also Advanced.

Work on all the boats is progressing favorably according to reports from Herreshoffs and Lawleys, and is is expected that all will be in the water by May 1.

After fitting and preliminary tuning up all four boats will probably take part in the New York Yacht Club's regatta at Glen Cove in June and also will race in some of the weekly regattas of the Yacht Racing Association of Long Island Sound during the latter part of that month.

Though both E. Walter Clark and Gerard B. Lambert, owners of Resolute and Vanitie, respectively, are members of the syndicates building the new boats, it is not unlikely that the former cup defender and its running mate will be seen in competition against the new boats in these races.

The new yachts will also race in Class J and the results of these brushes will afford yachtsmen an opportunity to see what advancement has been made in big-boat designing since the days of the last cup defender.

New Races in Class.

Last season many of the clubs scheduled races in Class J in order to accommodate Vanitie and Resolute, but the appearance of these two was very infrequent. With 25 starters in a regatta, as was the case during one of the days of Larchmont race week, the jam at the starting line is terrific and the danger of one of the smaller boats getting in the way of the larger craft is very great.

It is quite possible, therefore, that some of the clubs may schedule the Class J race for Vanitie, Resolute and the four cup boats, well in advance of the starting time for the other classes, so as to get them off before the smaller boats commence to rendezvous at the starting line.

After the June races on the Sound the cup boats will be raced off Newport throughout July and up to the time of the New York Yacht Club's cruise in August. They will probably be hauled out about Aug. 1 and hauled again after the cruise, just prior to the elimination races. In the New York Yacht Club's cruise they will be contenders in the Kings and Astor Cup races and other feature events, and by the time these races are over they should be at the top of their racing form.

FEARS COMPETITION ON GRAIN SHIPPING

Port Authority Says Deepening of St. Lawrence Would Endanger New York's Position.

SURVEY HERE IS AWAITED

Canadian Shipments Through This Harbor Have Increased While Domestic Trade Has Fallen.

The proposed deepening of the St. Lawrence waterway would endanger the position of New York as a place of export of Canadian grain, as it would permit the 10,000-ton freight ships of the Great Lakes to move down from the head of the lakes to Montreal for trans-shipment of freight to ocean-going vessels, according to the Port Authority.

A survey of conditions in New York in so far as the movement of Canadian grain is concerned has been promised by the Treasury Department as the result of a complaint by the Port Authority against a ruling of the Commissioner of Customs. This set a maximum of ninety days on the holding of bonded Canadian grain in transit by the railroads. The ruling has been declared inoperative pending the outcome of the promised survey.

Domestic Shipments Decline.

Meanwhile, the port has assumed a high standing as a grain exporting centre because of the Canadian grain movements despite the decrease of domestic wheat movement. The current bulletin of the Port Authority says:

"The post-war exports of United States grain through the Atlantic seaboard continues the downward trend of pre-war years, which was temporarily reversed by the large export movement during the war period.

"The States shipping the bulk of their grain through the Port of New York are those having access to the Great Lakes and the cheap lake-and-rail and lake-and-canal routes. Exports from this region have been on the decline, and most authorities believe that a diminishing portion of the production of this area will be available as an exportable surplus.

"The exports of grain produced in the United States fell off through the United States ports of the North Atlantic seaboard in the year ending June 30, 1929, as compared with the year ending June 30, 1928, by 18,000,000 bushels, or 40 per cent. During the same period there was a gain of 19,000,000 bushels through the Gulf ports and an increase of 4,000,000 bushels through lake ports en route to Montreal.

"There are several factors contributing to the decline in exports of United States wheat through the North Atlantic seaboard. One of them is the decreasing production in the States bordering on the Great Lakes as compared to an increasing production in the Winter wheat area centring in Kansas and Nebraska. A factor contributing to the diversion of United States grain from our North Atlantic ports to Montreal is the difference in standards maintained on export grades which permits exporters to secure greater tolerance in delivering contract grades at Canadian ports.

"The decline in exports of United States grain through the port of New York is more than offset by the rapid gain in the movement of Canadian grain in bond. Exports of Canadian grain through the port of New York increased from 28,000,000 bushels in 1923 to 73,000,000 bushels in 1928. The Canadian wheat acreage has expanded rapidly and is still increasing.

"About 80 per cent of the Canadian exports moves via the Atlantic ports of Canada and the United States. The Canadian crop is harvested several weeks later than the United States Spring wheat and moves through the port of New York during the Winter while Montreal is icebound. The fast and frequent liner service and the cheap parcel lot rates offered by these liners are added attractions to the export of Canadian wheat through the port of New York.

Hudson Bay Road a Competitor.

"The completion in 1930 of the Hudson Bay Railroad will offer a competitive outlet to Canadian grain for a short Summer period of six weeks through Port Churchill. The much-discussed deeper St. Lawrence waterway, if constructed, offers much greater competition to the port of New York as an outlet for export Canadian grain, since it would permit the movement of the 10,000-ton upper lake freighters down from the head of the lakes to Montreal for transshipment to ocean vessels at that port.

"At the present time, however, the Canadian grain moving in bond for export through the port of New York promises to sustain its position as one of the world's great grain ports."

The proposed deepening of the St. Lawrence has assumed importance in American shipping circles as a rival to the scheme of creating an all-American waterway from the Great Lakes to the Atlantic. The threat to New York as a grain-exporting centre is a second phase of its importance. Canadian grain made up 85 per cent of the total grain exported through the port of New York in 1928, and when the ruling of the Commissioner of Customs threatened to injure the movement further, the Port Authority in its complaint to the Secretary of the Treasury described its importance as follows:

"If by action of our Government officials, movement of Canadian grain is virtually shut off from United States ports by arbitrary customs regulations, the railroads, elevator and terminal interests and steamship lines serving the port of New York will suffer a disastrous loss of commerce."

THE WEATHER.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Dec. 7.—The disturbance that was over Northern Texas Friday night has advanced rapidly northeastward to Ohio, whence it will move northeastward. Another disturbance is over Colorado, moving eastward, a third is over Northern Manitoba and a fourth over British Columbia. An area of high pressure of moderate intensity is moving eastward over the Lower St. Lawrence Valley.

Pressure is also high in the region of Bermuda and is relatively high over Eastern Montana and Missouri and Kansas. Temperatures have risen along the South Atlantic and east Gulf coast and over the Dakotas and Minnesota and have fallen in the Middle Mississippi Valley, Oklahoma and Northeastern Texas.

The outlook is for considerable cloudiness with rain over central and southern and snows and rains over extreme northern sections of the Washington forecast district Sunday and Monday except for fair weather on Monday in the South Atlantic States.

It will be colder on Sunday in the Ohio Valley and Tennessee and on Sunday afternoon or night in the South Atlantic and the middle and south portions of the Middle Atlantic States and in Southern New England.

COUNTRY-WIDE WEATHER CONDITIONS.

SECURITIES EXCHANGE MARKS NEW ERA FOR REAL ESTATE

Anton L. Trunk, Secretary New York Real Estate Securities Exchange, Inc.

Aaron Rabinowitz, Vice President New York Real Estate Securities Exchange, Inc.

Cyrus C. Miller, Former Borough President of the Bronx, President New York Real Estate Securities Exchange, Inc.

Morton R. Cross, Treasurer New York Real Estate Securities Exchange, Inc.

Peter Grimm, Chairman Board of Governors New York Real Estate Securities Exchange, Inc.

WITH the inauguration of the New York Real Estate Securities Exchange, Inc., on Monday, Dec. 16, the field of organized finance and investment will include for the first time in history an Exchange solely devoted to trading in securities based on real estate.

In celebration of the event leaders of finance, industry and government will come together with members of the Exchange at a luncheon in the Hotel Biltmore on that day.

Later they will witness the actual beginning of trading operations on the trading floor in the Real Estate Board Building at 12 East Forty-first Street.

Designed by its sponsor, the Real Estate Board of New York, to fill definite needs in real estate financing and investment, the Exchange is the result of more than twenty years of study and work.

Formal investigation of the problem was begun by the board sixteen years ago, and on the results obtained it has based the organization and method of operation for the new institution.

Investigate Listings.

During recent months the officials have made steady strides toward actual functioning. Physical equipment adapted to the actual nature of the trading floor has been provided.

At the same time the committee on listings, of which Robert E. Dowling is chairman, has been engrossed in examining statements of financial condition, business history and personnel of corporations submitting securities for listing.

The committee on membership, with J. Clarence Davies as chairman, recently announced a membership of 182, drawn from real estate men, bankers and brokers.

As a new unit in the realm of finance as well as real estate, the Exchange has attracted the attention of important bankers, both in New York and out of town. The interest has been widespread also among the economists, who, together with many bankers, have commended the Exchange to Cyrus C. Miller, its president.

In analyzing the institution, a great number of economists stressed the liquidity resulting from an organized securities market as its important contribution to the country's economic system. Others emphasized the stabilizing of values brought about through recording and reporting daily on transactions.

The consensus was that the Exchange would, in filling a vacuum in the financial system of real estate, make capital more readily available and open the profits of real estate investment to a greater number of investors.

Effect on Construction.

President Miller says this of the Exchange: "What the public in general will be most interested in, I believe, will be the effect the improved method of financing will have on domestic and commercial building.

"That larger financial capacity will enable real estate operators to work in larger units is a certainty.

"It also follows that greater efficiency is possible in larger units.

"Changes which will affect the daily intimate lives of the people are the logical outcome of the forward movements of the Exchange. What happens as a result of the inauguration of the Exchange will touch millions.

"We realize keenly that the New York Real Estate Securities Exchange must merit public faith, and that the degree of confidence it inspires in the public will measure its success.

"Although it will be revolutionary in the real estate field in America, the Exchange does not start under a handicap of strangeness and unfamiliarity to investors as a method of buying and selling securities. The public is already acquainted with the salient features of its operation, for, in general, it is patterned after the New York Stock Exchange.

"The necessity for launching the project under sponsorship enjoying the firm confidence of the public has been acknowledged as a prerequisite to success. For this reason it was decided that the Real Estate Board of New York should be the sponsor. It stands responsible for the discharge of duty assumed by real estate on its initiation into the field of organized financial markets."

Membership Restricted.

While the membership of the Exchange is restricted to members of the Real Estate Board, it does not limit the membership to residents of New York. It is also national in character with regard to listing of securities, provided they pass the tests of the committee on listing.

Securities may be listed on property in any part of the country.

The trading floor provides the Exchange with highly efficient equipment for transactions. It occupies the ground floor of the Real Estate Board Building and is entered from the building lobby.

Approximately half the room is devoted to the actual trading floor, the remainder to the communications section, the conference room and executive offices.

A member of the Board of Directors explaining how the Exchange will function said:

"Regulations for buying and selling on the Exchange have been established to make the transactions as simple and as easy as possible for the investor and the brokers.

"Use of its facilities is obtained by investors in practically the same way as those of other Exchanges. As an example of how an investor may use the Exchange, suppose Mrs. Martha Smith, a resident of Indianapolis, wants to sell some real estate bonds. She confers with her banker.

The Trading Procedure.

"Informed of the method of marketing securities, he may look in a morning or evening newspaper to see the market price. The banker may advise Mrs. Smith to get in touch with the Indianapolis branch of some firm with membership in the Exchange. She explains her desire to sell to the firm and gives instructions to sell, let us suppose, at the market price.

"The order to sell is wired to the New York office of the firm. It is sent to the floor broker by telephone. This part of the procedure, of course, is simplified if Mrs. Smith lives in New York.

"The broker who receives the order to sell at the Exchange goes to the trading post at which the particular securities are listed, each security being assigned to a definite trading post.

"He hears the bonds being offered at $105.50. Another broker bids $105. His order to sell at the market authorizes him to offer the bonds at $105. The man who has been bidding that price 'takes' them and the securities have been sold for Mrs. Smith.

"The transaction is further carried out between two brokers through exchange of 'buy' orders and 'sell' orders, bearing the respective names and initials of each. The selling broker informs his office by telephone of the sale, and the facts are telegraphed to Mrs. Smith.

"The exchange of initialed orders obligated the buying broker to receive the bonds in accordance with details of delivery set forth by the constitution of the Exchange. This is followed by arrangements made between Mrs. Smith and the broker's office to receive the money and deliver the bonds.

"The Exchange will be open daily for trading from eleven to twelve."

Idea Generally Approved.

Leaders in real estate, finance and investment recognized the need for an organized market many years ago. Their early discussions served only to emphasize a single fact—the idea of applying the principles of an exchange to real estate securities was approved generally. When this approval had gathered sufficient strength to warrant the definite plans, responsibility for doing the work was taken logically by the Real Estate Board of New York.

It created a stock listing committee, with Edgar A. Tredwell as its chairman, in 1903, the first definite move toward organizing the Exchange. It collected data and made preliminary surveys of the problem.

The World War delayed further effort, but soon after the committee began its investigations again. Intermittently after 1920 it made various reports to the governors of the Real Estate Board. Early in his presidency of the board Peter Grimm appointed a special committee to further the project and to crystallize the results of the studies into definite recommendations.

This committee included J. Clarence Davies, Cyrus C. Miller and Lewis H. May. Later they were joined by Lawrence McGuire, Aaron Rabinowitz, Edgar A. Tredwell and Frederick C. Hobbs.

The formal proposals for organization were made to the board of governors of the Real Estate Board at a meeting to which all of the former governors had been invited. They examined and discussed, approved and authorized the project.

Shortly, the plans were formally announced, and on March 13, 1929, the constitution was adopted. Since then executives and governing officials of the Exchange have worked diligently in perfecting details.

Vice President of the Exchange Aaron Rabinowitz said yesterday:

Response to Modern Demand.

"The Exchange is definitely a response to the demands of modern commercial and domestic building. With the increase in size of the average city building, the need for large capital has also grown. The real estate operator must turn to the public to raise this money.

"It is the same source to which other lines of big business have gone. The investing public at the same time becomes a part owner of the project through the holding of securities, and, of course, a sharer in the profits.

"It is estimated by authorities that for the past five years each year has seen $10,000,000,000 worth of new buildings added to the national wealth. The value of the ground is estimated at $2,500,000,000, making the total amount required to finance real estate business $12,500,000,000.

"The individual owners and operators, according to statistics, have put in only $2,500,000,000. The remainder was raised in some form of security either by sale to banks or to the investing public.

To Make Securities Liquid.

"The sale of real estate securities has been carried on without the facilities of an organized market. Real estate securities have been frozen, yet they have received the confidence of the investing public. The sale of billions of dollars annually despite market disadvantages speaks highly for their substantial character. It is partly with a view to making these securities liquid that the New York Real Estate Securities Exchange has been established."

The executive and governing personnel of the institution includes men of long experience in real estate operation and finance.

A majority of them have been identified with the development of the Exchange from the beginning, a significant point in view of the special character of the securities which will be handled.

Cyrus C. Miller is president, Aaron Rabinowitz vice president, Morton R. Cross treasurer, and Anton L. Trunk secretary.

Peter Grimm is chairman of the board of governors, which includes Albert B. Ashforth, William H. Class, Morton R. Cross, J. Clydesdale Cushman, J. Clarence Davies, Robert E. Dowling, Charles G. Edwards, Douglas L. Elliman, Frederick G. Hobbs, David H. Knott, Lewis H. May, Laurence McGuire, Cyrus C. Miller, Harris H. Murdock, Aaron Rabinowitz, Edgar A. Tredwell, Anton L. Trunk, Douglas Vought and Irving S. Whiting.

Harold J. Treanor is counsel, Truman S. Mersereau business secretary, and Edward L. Bernays counsel on public relations.

The roster of members includes many of the best-known names in practically every branch of the real estate business. It is further diversified by prominent men in the brokerage business, including members of almost all the other exchanges, as well as lawyers, architects, bankers, builders and members of building management organizations.

CHANGING SCENES IN WAVERLY PLACE

Residential Construction Is Altering Character of the Neighborhood.

OLD LOFTS DISAPPEARING

Louis Jakobson Syndicate Completes an Apartment Hotel and Plans Other Houses.

New residential construction in the easterly Waverly Place section is bringing a transformation in the appearance of a neighborhood which for a long time boasted of few modern buildings, some blocks of which were occupied mostly by old loft buildings, many of them only half tenanted.

In addition to the apartments and apartment hotels recently completed or under way in that district, several major projects are in prospect on sites already assembled for other buildings.

With its announcement last week of the opening of the thirteen-story apartment hotel at 11 Waverly Place, corner of Mercer Street, the syndicate of which Louis Jakobson is the head made public through H. S. Hillyer & Co., its agents, details of its plans for erecting several other apartment structures in the neighborhood.

The new Jakobson building was completed 130 days after the delivery of steel to the job, and was 85 per cent leased before completion. It occupies the site of the old Jannsen Building. A twenty-one story hotel is being erected at University Place and Waverly Place by the Harper Associates. New York University is building a new unit at West Fourth and Greene Streets. The Jakobson group plans a fourteen-story apartment house at 15 Washington Place, and across the street at 14 Washington Place still another, also fourteen stories in height.

John Daniell & Sons will build at Eighth Street and Broadway a structure of twenty-three stories, utilizing probably the first four floors as a department store and renting the remaining space of about 1,000 rooms as apartments.

"Although long neglected, Washington Square East is a coming residential section," says Mr. Hillyer. "It is one of the most convenient locations in the city, near the bus terminal in Washington Square and close to the I. R. T. and B. M. T. subways and elevated lines. A further advantage is that it is largely isolated from the noise of heavy traffic."

The fact that the section was occupied so long by old loft buildings prevented its keeping step with New York's increasing property values, according to Mr. Hillyer. He pointed out that such a condition will enable builders in the neighborhood to offer moderate rentals.

The architecture of the new apartment hotel at 11 Waverly Place is Spanish. The roof has penthouses, with private promenades, and a large promenade for the benefit of all tenants. A number of apartments are being decorated in modernistic style. Five of the stores on the street floor have been leased.

HEARST COMPANY BUYS BIG BROOKLYN PLOT

Acquires Fifth and Atlantic Avenue Frontages in Railroad Centre.

The Apperson Realty Corporation, in which William Randolph Hearst is interested, has just purchased a large Brooklyn plottage. It includes the easterly front on Fifth Avenue, from Atlantic Avenue to Pacific Street. The property was bought from Eugene F. Martin. It is now vacant and comprises all of the property on the block bounded by Fifth, Sixth and Atlantic Avenues and Pacific Street except the portion used by the Long Island Railroad Company as a freight terminal yard.

The southeast corner of Atlantic and Fifth Avenues was formerly occupied by the six-story factory building erected in 1875 by the late Elizur G. Webster, who came to Brooklyn in 1857 and became a prominent silversmith. He established the firm of E. G. Webster & Sons and carried on his business for more than fifty years there. He purchased the property from the late George A. Powers in 1875 for $42,914, a record price in that day.

The northeast corner of Pacific Street and Fifth Avenue contains a four-story warehouse, formerly occupied by Schwarzschild & Sulzberger, meat packers, and recently by Wilson & Co., in the same business.

These buildings were all part of the development adjoining the old Atlantic Avenue Railroad Company, which took place in the late '70s, to take advantage of the shipping facilities furnished by the building of that road. It was a big factory centre among the many improvements in and around the railway depot at Flatbush, Fourth and Atlantic Avenues.

The first subway constructed in Brooklyn had its terminus at the Long Island Railroad depot.

The Pyle-Gray Real Estate Company and Huberth & Huberth were the brokers in the transaction.

PARK AVENUE COOPERATIVE.

Excavations Completed for New Sixteen-Story House.

Excavation work has been completed for the sixteen-story cooperative apartment house which Joseph Paterno will erect at 1,220 Park Avenue, northwest corner of Ninety-fifth Street. The building is due to be ready for occupancy in the Fall of 1930. Several penthouses as well as suites with terraces will be provided. Apartments will range in size from seven to fourteen rooms.

Mr. Paterno recently completed the fifteen-story cooperative at 30 Sutton Place. Rosario Candela is architect for the Park Avenue project and Brown, Wheelock, Harris, Vought & Co. are the selling and managing agents.

Benjamin Winter Predicts Rise in Prices in New Business Zone.

HIGHER REVENUE POSSIBLE

Few Companies to Control Choice Realty in Future, Apartment House Owners Are Told.

Recent zoning changes opening Park Avenue from Forty-sixth to Fifty-seventh Street to business should bring a sharp increase in the demand for real estate in that zone and thus foster a rise in the value of property there, Benjamin Winter told the apartment house group of the Building Managers and Owners' Association of New York, Inc., last week at the Town Hall Club.

"Business development means increased land values," Mr. Winter said, "because of the larger revenues that business buildings bring in. In the case of Park Avenue, the advance will not be limited to the eleven blocks affected by the recent zoning decision, but the change will increase the demand for living quarters on Park Avenue north of Fifty-seventh Street.

"I do not think it is an exaggeration to predict that not so many years hence the most favorable Park Avenue sites will be bringing as high as $500 to $600 a square foot, as compared to the present average of about $200 a square foot."

Mr. Winter asserted that real estate operations were approaching such magnitude and requiring such extensive capital, because high land values made giant buildings essential, that probably within another quarter a century no more than a half dozen companies would control most of the important real estate holdings in New York.

"Real estate," he said, "must follow the course of the great public utilities, which, for economies of operation and adequate financing, are concentrated in a few important companies consolidating interests from one end of the country to the other. The ultimate consumer has benefited as much from such giant mergers as have the companies.

"A century ago a few great families owned most of New York's real estate. In a few more years history will repeat itself, with a mere handful of powerful companies controlling most of the important real estate of the city. And the next step, a logical and necessary development, will be the linking of real estate interests throughout the country through powerful holding companies.

"The economies in management and in favorable financing, which such mergers will make possible, will mean tremendous savings from which the consumer—the tenant—will derive decided benefits, just as public utilities now give their individual consumers service which would never be possible through individual companies."

REALTY MEN WILL FLY TO CONVENTION

Camden Delegation Charters a Plane for New Jersey Conference This Week.

Edward J. Borden, president of the Camden County Real Estate Board, announced that a delegation of twelve Camden realty men will fly to the thirteenth annual convention of the New Jersey Association of Real Estate Boards at Atlantic City, beginning Thursday and continuing through the week. The trip will be made in a Ford plane on Wednesday afternoon, starting from the Central Airport at Camden.

Those planning to make the trip are Carl R. Evered, G. Carr Jessup, William W. Chalmers, Mr. and Mrs. William A. Eppright, Phillip Zinman, S. N. Miller, William H. Aiff, George A. McLaughlin, Earl R. Lippincott, Edward J. Borden and Ethel Nebel.

The plane will fly to Asbury Park and then follow the coast down to Atlantic City.

A large delegation of members in Northern New Jersey will go to the convention by a special train over the Pennsylvania Railroad on Wednesday afternoon. Among those having reservations from Newark are John F. O'Brien, John J. Berry, Charles C. Lurich, John A. Linnett, Joseph L. Feibleman, Louis Herman, Murray Apfelbaum, Harry J. Stevens, David Houston, Mr. and Mrs. Fred Romine, Bertram A. Ham, Lawrence C. Kennedy, Wallace McDowell, Benjamin Baurer and Max Fischmann.

From Jersey City there will be Julius Kislak and J. Harry Miller; from Union City, Edward McDermott, Percy A. Gaddis, Herman Bauridel and Walter F. Glock; from Bergen County, Patrick J. Carney, Arthur J. Rooney, George B. Hitchcock, M. D. Easton, J. Roscoe Allen, George F. Beckman, Guy Seaver, Louis N. Nicholson and Jack T. Wilson; from Morris County, George W. Morse, Wallace M. Husk, Vincent D. Roache, William H. Jewell and Frank B. Fay.

Delegates from the Oranges and Maplewood include Margaret Van Deman, Howard Raymond, George F. LaCombe, Frank H. Taylor, Harry A. Taylor, Gilbert N. Swett, William Mansfield, Kenneth Dalzell and Durand Taylor; from New Brunswick, Edward J. Cahill and James N. Harkins.

WATER PENALTY CHANGED.

Realty Board Approves Adoption of 7 Per Cent Rate.

Approval of the change in charges against unpaid water bills in New York, recently adopted by the Municipal Assembly, is expressed in a letter to Controller Berry, who initiated the change, in a letter sent to him by Peter Grimm of the Real Estate Board of New York, Inc.

The interest rate on unpaid bills now is 7 per cent. Heretofore the penalty on bills due Jan. 1 was 5 per cent on April 1 and an additional 10 per cent on July 1.

This year Controller Berry inaugurated other changes designed to increase the efficiency of the city's fiscal department and to accommodate property owners, the realty board points out. He adopted a plan, long urged by that organization, to consolidate the various departments for the receipt of tax payments and enable property owners to remit their obligations at one point instead of at various scattered bureaus in each borough. Controller Berry also established a bureau in the Finance Department for the purpose of acquainting taxpayers and prospective real estate owners with impending assessments for local improvements.

NEW INDUSTRIAL TYPE.

Watts Street Building Represents $2,500,000 Investment.

The modernistic style of architecture will be used in the erection of the sixteen-story reinforced concrete industrial building to go up on the Watts Street blockfront between Sixth Avenue and Thompson Street, according to the architects, Shampan & Shampan. The three façades of the building will be of polished granite and Indiana limestone for the first two stories and above this will be used an impervious face brick of light color with terra cotta trimming. The operation will represent an investment of about $2,500,000.

MEMBERS HONOR VREELAND

Present Motor Car to Retiring Long Island President.

An automobile was presented to V. H. Vreeland at the annual dinner-dance of the Long Island Real Estate Board last week at the Hotel Pennsylvania in recognition of his excellent work for the association during his two years as president. Mr. Vreeland formally retired from the office at the dinner meeting and was succeeded by William L. Enequist.

ACTIVE FEATURES OF CITY AND SUBURBAN REALTY MARKET

BUSINESS GROWTH IN WHITE PLAINS

Mamaroneck Avenue Furnishes an Object Lesson of Rapid Commercial Expansion.

BIG ADVANCE IN VALUES

Two Large Holdings Nearly Ready for Apartment Development in Near Future.

Among the outstanding factors in White Plains which present a striking object lesson of its growth within recent years is the rapid business development on Mamaroneck Avenue and the great rise in property values there. From Main Street to the Post Road the avenue is well built up with fine commercial structures aggregating several millions of dollars in value and several others are being projected beyond the Post Road extending as far as the station of the New York, Westchester & Boston Railroad.

The fulfillment of the prediction made several years ago by R. Franklin Hull, one of the old-time realty men in White Plains—recalls one of the early inhabitants during the strictly residential period—would have brought joy to the heart of that sterling pioneer of earlier days, Johnny Miles, who built the Todd Building at the southwest corner of Martine and Mamaroneck Avenues. It was built at a time when many shook their heads doubtfully at the recklessness of making such an investment in business property on a residential thoroughfare. The street had been a place of residence for old White Plains families for many years. It was also the speedway where "Chet" Purdy, Dan Maloney, Joe Gordon and others raced their favorite horses hitched to cutters or light racing carts.

Recent Sales Activity.

Some idea of the activity in Mamaroneck Avenue property may be gained from the fact that, in less than two years, there have been thirty-two sales or long-term leases in the first six blocks, one parcel having changed ownership three times and five properties having been sold twice.

Some of the more important transactions include the sale of the Tod Building to August Schieber at a reported price of $675,000, the Thompson Building, corner Mamaroneck and Martine Avenues, at a reported price of $550,000 to Moe Mark; the Faite garage building at 7 Mamaroneck Avenue to the same buyer at a reported price of $3,000 a front foot; the northeast corner of Mamaroneck Avenue and Post Road, sold by Leonard Davidow and associates and now developed with an attractive building nearing completion; the southwest corner of Mamaroneck Avenue and Post Road, sold to Nathan Derecktor; the properties on the west side of Mamaroneck Avenue near Quarropas Street, sold by G. Keene and E. B. Allen to Hyman Shatz and resold to the National Real Estate Corporation.

"The future development of Mamaroneck Avenue as a business thoroughfare seems firmly assured," states Mr. Hull. "A business street which has made such strides within a few years is not likely to be retarded in its growth. We also know that there is a direct relation between growth in population and demand for business frontage to supply the needs of that increased population.

"A survey of forty-one communities, including several cities, within a distance of fifty-seven miles from Chicago showed approximately fifty feet of business property in use by every 100 people in the forty-one cities and villages measured. No wide survey of similar character has been made of the communities near New York but, judging from income tax figures, it is probably safe to assume a 20 per cent greater buying power in the population near New York—therefore a need for sixty feet of business frontage actually in use for every 100 people.

Population Tendencies.

"Mr. Heydecker of the Committee for Regional Plan for New York and its environs has recently predicted a population of 1,000,000 in Westchester County within a few years—practically a doubling of our present population. White Plains, the county seat, will probably receive more than its proportion of the increase. In what sections of White Plains will there be room to absorb a large share of the new residents? In answering this question we must not overlook one factor—the tendency of many new people to move into an apartment first before buying or renting a home. After the present apartment houses have been filled up this will create a need for new buildings and this leads us to the Waller and Carhart sections, immediately adjacent to Mamaroneck Avenue, as logical areas for expansion.

"The Waller property extends from the Post Road to Maple Avenue and from Mamaroneck Avenue to South Broadway. By general consent of the property owners the restrictions which previously limited that section to private, residential use have been recently set aside.

"The Carhart homestead extends from Maple Avenue and Green Place on the north to the Westchester & Boston station and from Mamaroneck Avenue back to the railroad. Although it has been subject to an old restriction which states that 'no building of the character or description known as a tenement house' shall be erected, there has been a recent decision by Judge Bleakley in the case of Singer vs. Sudman that a modern, up-to-date apartment house is not a 'tenement house' within the intent and meaning of this restriction.

New Apartment Centres.

"The Waller and Carhart sections have space for apartment houses which will eventually house perhaps 10,000 people and, according to the 10-6 ratio previously mentioned, this will create a need for the use of 6,000 feet of business frontage on Mamaroneck Avenue.

"I am not referring to any need for additional unimproved property in the business zone, as the territory now included in this zone is amply sufficient for future requirements. What will be needed is an adequate construction of new stores to keep abreast of the needs of an increasing population.

"Natural advantages of location and increase in population of the surrounding territory are sufficient to afford Mamaroneck Avenue a splendid future. This may be hastened if all the merchants and business men on the thoroughfare will cooperate in obtaining necessary improvements."

RAIL GRADE CHANGES PROVE AID TO REALTY

Progress Made in Eliminating Crossings in the Metropolitan Area.

Substantial benefits are accruing to real estate in many communities in the metropolitan area through the efforts being put forth to eliminate grade crossings, according to J. E. McGolrick, president of the McGolrick Realty Company. These efforts are bearing fruit particularly in Westchester County and on Long Island, Mr. McGolrick points out.

"Marked progress is being made on the elimination of these dangerous traffic obstructions on Long Island," he said. "It took eight years to get started, but work on eliminating grade crossings in Jamaica is now being rushed. As 90 per cent of the traffic bound for outward points passes through Jamaica, this point became a bottle neck, and the serious congestion problem has been aggravated by the grade crossings on the arterial routes.

"Besides wiping out six grade crossings, three overhead crossings also are being removed and replaced by underpasses. The work is to cost approximately $7,000,000, and the project was launched in October.

"The crossings being eliminated are at Smith Street, New York Avenue, Puntine Street, Canal Street, Brenton Avenue, on the main line of the Long Island Railroad, and South Street on the Montauk division. The bridges are being eliminated at Union Hall Street, Prospect Street and Washington Street.

"Further east on Long Island the work will continue. The Public Service Commission has ordered the elimination of seven important crossings of the Long Island Railroad in Lynbrook at a cost of $3,000,000. These are at Horton Avenue, Wright Avenue, Atlantic Avenue, Forest Avenue, Earl Avenue, Deonton Avenue and Broadway. Work has already started on the elimination of grade crossings in Valley Stream, and it will not be long before the crossings on the main highways at this point will afford swift undelayed passage underneath or above the tracks. Other crossings are to be eliminated in Rockville Centre and in communities further east by order of the Public Service Commission."

SHOP AREA EXPANDS IN MADISON AVENUE

New Seven-Story Building to House Branch of London Shoe Firm.

The fashionable shopping district on Madison Avenue, started within the past decade and expanded rapidly during the past few years, is continuing its growth. New firms are being added.

The latest addition to the district is Fortnum & Mason, Ltd., manufacturers of shoes and sports apparel, with headquarters at 181 Piccadilly, London. This firm has leased from the Fansons Realty Company, Jacob Schroeder, president, the property at 697-99 Madison Avenue, with 39.9 feet frontage, between Sixty-second and Sixty-third Streets, on condition that the realty firm erect a seven-story commercial building on the site. It is understood that the building will be a replica of the English company's London store. The structure will be completed by Nov. 1, 1930. Sydney Goldstone will be the architect. Brown, Wheelock:Harris, Vought & Co. were the brokers in the deal.

The lease is for twenty years from Nov. 1, 1930, at an annual rate of $52,700, making the total consideration for the first term of the lease in excess of $1,000,000. The lessee has the right to renew the lease for three twenty-one-year terms, the net rental to be two and one-half times the rent which the Fansons Realty Corporation pays under a head lease from the 607-699 Madison Avenue Corporation, plus 1 per cent of the difference between $350,000 and the appraised value of the land and buildings at the beginning of the renewal term.

AUCTIONS IN BRONX.

James R. Murphy to Sell Several Brick Flats This Week.

A number of brick flats will be offered in foreclosure auction sales to be held this week by James R. Murphy in the Bronx real estate salesroom.

Tomorrow he will offer the vacant irregular plot at the southeast corner of Magenta Street and Bronxwood Avenue.

Tuesday he will sell the vacant plot on the south side of West 237th Street, 100 feet east of Broadway; two two-family houses on the east side of Harper Avenue, 71 feet south of Connor Street; 2,258 Westchester Avenue, a two-story brick building; 315 East 159th Street, a four-story and basement brick flat; the vacant block front, 200 feet on the south side of Waring Avenue, 263.68 feet on the east side of Bruner Avenue and 132.95 feet on the west side of De Meyer Street; also 647 Prospect Avenue, a three-story brick flat with store. Wednesday sales include 647 Faile Street, a five-and-one-half-story walk-up flat, and the vacant plot at the northeast corner of Longfellow Avenue and East 173d Street.

SAFE BUILDING WORK.

Wide Interest by Contractors in Accident Prevention.

More than 5,000 copies of the bulletin entitled, "A Safe Job," recently issued by the Committee on Accident Prevention of the Building Trades' Employer's Association, were distributed last week to the members of the association and affiliated organizations as an incentive to general and sub-contractors to protect their jobs so as to lessen the number of fatalities and injuries.

"The results of the committee during the past twenty-sixth months have been very gratifying," said William H. Wheeler, executive secretary, in reviewing its work. "We have compiled and distributed seven safety bulletins, others are in course of preparation, a poster contest has been conducted and our endeavors have been recognized by building associations and State labor officials in the principal cities of the United States."

WANTED LEMON PIE DAILY

Destruction of Fifth Avenue Landmark Recalls Some Amusing Incidents.

Antedating the famous Waldorf-Astoria Hotel by nearly twenty years the earlier Hotel Bristol on the northwest corner of Fifth Avenue and Forty-second Street is now in process of demolition for the fifty-eight-story office building to be erected by Walter J. Salmon. The Waldorf-Astoria by virtue of its thirty-six years of public service at the time its doors were closed early this year to those seeking board and lodging, had attained the dignity of a New York City landmark.

The Bristol Hotel erected about 1875 was an older and also a very interesting city landmark and is, perhaps, entitled to peculiar recognition because it succeeded in surviving, despite its central location in the business heart of Fifth Avenue, for more than half a century. Its memory as a hotel has virtually been forgotten within recent times. About fifteen years ago it succumbed to the trade invasion working northward on Fifth Avenue and has been used for stores and offices ever since.

The original Hotel Bristol was one of the first hostelries in the city constructed primarily as a family hotel catering to persons of wealth and social distinction. It maintained that character for several years and its guests included many prominent New Yorkers. Like most hotels, it also had its family squabbles which seem to be one of those unavoidable conditions when a number of human beings are congregated together under the same roof.

Hotel Squabbles.

The first difficulty of this nature occurred in September 1878 when, one of the guests moved out, refusing to pay his bill for the final three months of his yearly lease. The hotel management sued for the unpaid bill of $140, being the amount of the monthly lease on a three-room suite. The case was heard by Justice Pinckney in the old West Fifty-seventh Street court and judgment was given for the hotel.

During the trial of the case a mass of irrelevant but highly amusing testimony was brought out which showed that, notwithstanding the élite status of the guests, many of them possessed all of the human qualifications for faultfinding and bickering that are sometimes illogically supposed to be chiefly inherent among more plebian individuals. One of the complaints referred to the inadequacy of hot lunches.

Under the heading "Life in the Hotel Bristol" an interesting account of the court case was published in THE NEW YORK TIMES on Sept. 25, 1878, in which after noting the judge's decision the following description of various incidents among the "smart set" in the hotel, is given:

"The authorities of the Hotel Bristol account for the disaffection among some of their guests on the ground of personal difficulties and misunderstandings in the public parts of the hotel, and their counsel asserted in court that the guests who left combined to avoid paying rent for their rooms while they were in the country during the Summer. Some amusing stories are told of dining room and kitchen squabbles among people who, paying from $35 to $250 a week for their rooms, were presumably first class. One of the guests, on taking his family to the hotel, stipulated for a private waiter and to be served in his own rooms. The family desired, however, to eat in the common dining room for a few days, that they might become acquainted with some of their neighbors. One day a gentleman at a neighboring table inadvertently asked the 'private' waiter to hand him something, when the waiter's quondam proprietor hastily said to him, 'Don't you dare, sir, to wait upon anybody else in this dining room.' This, of course, was the cause of some unpleasantness that did not die out as easily as it might.

"Another boarder insisted upon having the fowls served whole upon his table, instead of cut in halves as the others were. The cook declining to do this without orders from the manager, the guest sent a waiter to that gentleman, asking his attendance in the dining room. The manager replied that he would be glad to see the gentleman in the hotel office if he desired to see him. The irate guest sent the waiter back immediately to say that if the manager did not wait upon him at once he would make a public address in the dining room. The manager's reply was such as to dissuade the gentleman from making any such display.

Lemon Pie Episode.

"One of the ladies complained that she could not get enough lemon pie, insisting that she should have it every day. The manager suggested that his boarders would soon be laid away in the silent tomb if fed every day with lemon pie, and that, besides, he had to please a great many, not one only, and that some of the guests would not care for such a surfeit of lemon pies. 'Anybody is a fool,' the lady replied, 'who does not like lemon pie.'

"A chambermaid on one of the upper floors had an unpleasant habit of neglecting all her constituents but two or three families, and to these she was obedience and carefulness itself. One day her insolence to one of the neglected boarders was reported to the manager, and the chambermaid was promptly discharged. One of the ladies to whom her chambership had been gracious hurried to the office and demanded of the manager how he dared discharge her chambermaid! The manager hinted that as he hired the servant and paid her he thought that discharging her was one of his privileges.

"'If you do not immediately restore her to her place,' said the lady, putting herself in a tragic attitude, 'I will leave the house.' Finding the manager immovable, the guests who had been well served by her secreted the chambermaid in an upper room and carried her meals to her for several days. But she was soon caught in one of the corridors and put out of the house.

"These little episodes are only a few examples of life in a first-class family hotel, going to show that the old Adam still lives as well on velvet carpets and Turkey rugs as in a Bowery lodging house.

Early Ownerships.

The official records of the original owners of the plot on which the new structure to be known as the 500 Fifth Avenue Building is to rise show that 500 to 506 Fifth Avenue and 1 to 7 West Forty-second Street covering a plot 100.5 feet on the avenue and 208.4 feet on the street, were deeded by the Mayor, Aldermen and commonality of the city of New York to Garrit Storm, on Feb. 27, 1845.

The next transaction shows the transfer of the property from Samuel Ver Planck Hoffman and Glorvina Hoffman to Louisa M. Livingston, a partition deed drawn Sept. 18, 1852, and recorded two days later. The land came to the Livingstons and Hoffmans under the will of Garrit Storm.

A deed executed July 1, 1922, shows that Robert L. Gerry and others, executors of Louisa M. Gerry, the former Louisa M. Livingston and wife of the late Commodore Eldridge T. Gerry, transferred the property to the Gerry Estates, Inc. That deed was recorded Sept. 18, 1922. Walter J. Salmon, president of 500 Fifth Avenue, Inc., acquired the property by lease in 1902.

Shreve, Lamb & Harmon are the architects for the new structure. Edward R. Walsh Company has the demolition contract and C. T. Wills, Inc., is the builder.

FIFTEEN old buildings closely associated with the colorful life along the lower East River waterfront will come down when the easterly block front on Old Slip, between South and Front Streets, is cleared for the erection of the new Assay Office of the Treasury Department of the Federal Government.

Some of the structures there are nearly a century old. Most of them have fire escapes to mar their front walls, tacked on when new building regulations made the addition of such equipment necessary. Dingy warehouses and cheap lodging houses, four and five stories high, face the riverfront. On South Street a hotel which once was the pride of the neighborhood now has only a small restaurant as its chief boast. One or two ship-chandlers still carry on their trade, but from their surroundings it is evident their business has felt the effect of the passing of the mode for sailing vessels. Young men bronzed by the sun and old ones whose wrinkled faces show the effect of having been whipped by salt air long ago wander occasionally through the streets and pause to watch the boats plying up and down the river.

One building at Old Slip and South Street, said to have been built 100 years ago, holds the headquarters of Local 1,617, Sailmakers of New York, a union formed in 1832.

The ground floors of some of the Front Street buildings have been remodeled to present a more modern appearance, and are occupied by commodity merchants and members of the neighboring Coffee Exchange. On South Street a heavy traffic serves the warehouses, piers and docks. Wall Street is only two blocks away.

Will Foster Realty Expansion.

The building of the Assay Office in this location is likely to foster the expansion of the financial district, real estate men believe. Already there is considerable activity along the waterfront. At No. 120 (the foot of Wall Street) an office skyscraper is nearing completion. The Clark Street tunnel to Brooklyn runs beneath Old Slip and will provide easy access to the Assay Office and to other structures which may go up.

The site faces the First Precinct Police Station and contains approximately 27,000 square feet of ground, or almost three times as much as is occupied by the old Assay Office, adjoining the Sub-Treasury Building in Wall Street, already sold for $6,501,000 to the Forty Wall Street Corporation to be the site for an addition to the Bank of the Manhattan Company's building being erected at 40 Wall Street.

The new location is expected to cost approximately $1,500,000, and is being acquired from seven owners, five of whom have agreed to voluntary conveyance. Land belonging to the other two, it is understood, will be acquired through condemnation. It is reported that title will be taken next Spring, in order that work may get under way early in 1930 on an important addition to lower Manhattan's buildings.

Difficulty in Assembling.

The usual difficulties in assembling plottage were encountered by Brown, Wheelock: Harris, Vought & Co., who acted as agents for the government. One stipulation which made the task more complicated was the requirement that the site be within three blocks of Wall and Nassau Streets. Other brokers assisted in the assemblage, and after about six months the property was fairly well in hand. Through the Charles F. Noyes Company, 77 Front Street and 28-32 Old Slip were made a part of the site. The Cruikshank Company helped to obtain 85-87 Front Street, and 41 South Street was added through Stanley Wolfson.

Old Slip is one of the few streets on the lower end of Manhattan which retains the designation "slip." About 150 years ago there were Whitehall Slip, which took its name from a large white house which dominated the thoroughfare; Peck Slip, so named after the owner of most of the land there; Coen & Antey's Slip; Beekman's Slip, so called after a well-known family living there, and Old Slip, which was the first of the group, and which, partly through sentiment, has been saved the fate of most of the others, which have come to be known as "streets" or which have taken entirely new names.

The slips were openings in the wharves in the river for horses and carts to enter to unload the cargoes of wooden boats which had run up into the slips during high tide and grounded there when the water receded.

PIER PLANS STUDIED.

Waterfront Committee Formed by First Avenue Association.

The First Avenue Association, "in order to protect properly the interests of members owning waterfront property," has organized a waterfront and pier committee, consisting of Henry A. Mark, William Church Osborn, Ernest P. Hoes, Bertram Lord, P. Chauncey Anderson and John D. Kennedy.

According to the association, the Dock Department of the city is preparing to spend $1,000,000 for a new pier at the foot of Old Slip, East River; $150,000 for rebuilding a pier at the foot of East Twenty-sixth Street, and $100,000 for improvements to a pier at East Fourth Street. These plans, as well as proposals for transferring certain steamship lines from the North River to piers in the East River, are receiving the committee's attention.

BROOKLYN AUCTION.

J. P. Day to Offer 106 Lots in Linden Boulevard Area.

In an auction sale to be held next Wednesday evening in the Pennsylvania Palace, in Brooklyn, Joseph P. Day will offer 106 business and residential lots fronting on Lindell Boulevard, Stanley, Alabama, Georgia and Sheffield Avenues.

The area, Mr. Day points out, is served by the New Lots division of the Interborough subway system, with a station at Pennsylvania Avenue, and by the Canarsie line of the B. M. T. Linden Boulevard, 170 feet wide, is a logical connecting link with the Sunrise Highway, he says. The community has two public schools.

SAYS WORD 'HOME' IS WELL DEFINED

Frank H. Vizetelly Calls the Dictionary Definitions Adequate.

"ABODE OF AFFECTIONS"

Lexicographer Takes Issue With Realty Association and Contest for New Description.

Prize competitions for the best definition of the word "home" fail to arouse the enthusiasm of that well-known lexicographer, Frank H. Vizetelly, editor of Funk & Wagnalls' New Standard Dictionary. In a letter to THE NEW YORK TIMES anent the $250 prize contest recently announced by the National Association of Real Estate Boards for a comprehensive description of the word "home," Mr. Vizetelly takes a position in respect to that word somewhat similar to the elder Walpole in regard to the strawberry who is reported to have made the famous remark that doubtless God might have made a better berry but he never did.

Mr. Vizetelly, while not actually implying that better definitions of "home" may be made, says very positively, after describing the way in which the word is defined in the Funk & Wagnalls' dictionary:

"There you have the best definition of 'home' that has ever been printed in a dictionary. But I didn't draft it."

In a statement issued by an official of the National Association of Real Estate Boards extracts of the definitions appearing in Webster's and Funk & Wagnalls' dictionaries are given.

"The gentleman," writes Mr. Vizetelly, "is said to want a definition such as would catch the sympathy of the public and make people think about home ownership, and has had the temerity to cite partly the definition of Funk & Wagnalls' New Standard Dictionary to prove his point and then condemn the work itself as inadequate."

He also adds that "we lexicographers have forgotten more about the word 'home,' except the mortgages, first and second, and the rates and taxes," than some other people ever knew.

For those who may be interested in reading the "best definition," the word "home" is thus described in the Funk & Wagnalls' dictionary:

"1. One's fixed place of abode: the dwelling-place of a person and his family; a family residence; also, the place in which one was brought up; as, he does business in town, but his home is in the country; one's old home. 2. Hence, a place or abode of affection, peace and rest; a congenial abiding-place.

"'Where we love is home,
Home that our feet may leave, but not our hearts.'
—Holmes "Homesick in Heaven," Stanza 5.

"Home, from the Anglo-Saxon, denoting originally a dwelling, came to mean an endeared dwelling as the scene of domestic loves and happy and cherished family life, a sense to which there is an increasing tendency to restrict the word—desirably so, since we have other words to denote the mere dwelling-place; we say 'The wretched tenement could not be called home;' or 'The humble cabin was dear to him as the home of his childhood.'

"'Home's not merely four square walls,
Tho' with pictures hung and gilded,
Home is where affection calls—
Where its shrine the heart has builded.'

"Thus the word comes to signify any place of rest and peace, and especially heaven, as the soul's peaceful and eternal dwelling-place."

SALES PASS $3,000,000.

Massapequa Park Business Well Ahead of 1928.

Sales of lots in Massapequa Park, L. I., this year have passed $3,000,000, Brady, Cryan & Colleran announced yesterday. The total is 50 per cent above the 1928 figure, it was stated. November sales exceeded $300,000.

The company considered the continued upward trend of its business in November as an indication that the stock market break will not be reflected to any great extent in real estate, and has declared an extra dividend of 2 per cent on its 8 per cent cumulative preferred stock in addition to the eighth regular semi-annual dividend.

ACTIVE REALTY YEAR, SAYS JERSEY BUILDER

Improved Transit Facilities Will Aid Newark and Essex County.

Indications all point to an active building year in Newark and Essex County N. J., states R. Thomas Bowers, head of Philip J. Bowers & Co., one of the large developing and operating organizations in Northern Jersey. He predicts that the next twelve months will find suburban and home building operations very active.

"Perhaps the most significant phase of the construction projected in Newark and vicinity is the better improvement of transportation systems which will greatly facilitate existing conditions both from the standpoint of the New York commuter and the Newark suburban dweller," Mr. Bowers said. "The new Pennsylvania Station with its increase in trackage will eliminate the present Manhattan Transfer complications while the extension of the Manhattan tubes from Park Place, Newark, to South Street, will open the way for thousands of new commuters. Also to be considered is the fast line trolley to be built in the bed of the old Morris Canal. This line will operate through downtown Newark and through the Roseville section to Bloomfield.

"Perhaps the major transportation project is the Lackawanna's electrification program which will bring electrical transportation to all of the Lackawanna's branches in Essex County including the Montclair line, the main line through Short Hills and Summit, and the Gladstone-Peapack branch.

"Motor travel will be benefited by completion of the two great State highways, Numbers 10 and 21, which will bring relief to motorists bound to or from Manhattan. One of these roads will lead to the new Hudson River bridge and the other to the Holland vehicular tunnel.

"Most of these improvements are already under way and should prove a strong stimulant to the 1930 real estate situation in Essex County where many new suburban developments have recently been opened to commuters."

One of the Bowers developments is at famous Short Hills on the fifty-six acre estate purchased from Mrs. John Taylor, widow of the late president of a Kansas City department store. On the property twenty-four homes have been built, of which twenty are occupied. They average $62,000 in price. The tract has been improved with sewerage, paving, electric and water installations.

MAKE CITY PLANNING HOME SHOW FEATURE

Models of Transportation Projects Will Be a Part of the Exposition.

The progress made in providing attractive environment and improved transportation facilities for home communities in the metropolitan area through city planning and scientific development will be shown in exhibits arranged by the city planning committee of the Home Show which will be held in Grand Central Palace March 31 to April 5, 1930.

The exhibits will include models, maps, photographs and other data of interest to the home owner and developer. Tenement houses, subways, parks, streets and other projects will be explained.

"Among exhibits already promised are cross-section models of the new subways where they intersect or cross other subways, which will be enhanced by drawings showing the sections of the city to be served by the new subway system," E. P. Goodrich, chairman of the committee, announced yesterday.

"The New York Central Railroad will display a model of the Riverside Drive extension improvement which is now under preparation. An exhibit will be made by the Regional Plan of New York and its environs. The Westchester County Park Commission will present a pictorial exhibit of Westchester County. The committee has requested the department of parks, Manhattan, to show models of playgrounds, while the Department of Plants and Structures will show complete drawings of the Triborough Bridge, for which ground was broken recently, and it is hoped to provide a complete model of the bridge for the home show. The Long Island State Park Commission will provide drawings and plans of the Long Island State Parks.

The personnel of the city planning committee was announced yesterday by Robert H. Sexton, managing director of the show, as follows:

Jay Downer, chief engineer, Westchester County Park Commission; Flavel Shurtleff, field secretary, Regional Plan of New York; Harold M. Lewis, engineering division, Regional Plan of New York; M. W. Wier, Richard Schermerhorn Jr., and Charles Downing Lay and Arthur S. Tuttle, consulting engineer for the Board of Apportionment, and Mr. Goodrich.

APARTMENTS AT AUCTION.

Manhattan Residence Property Features Kennelly Sale.

Several Manhattan apartment properties will be included in the auction sale to be held by Major William Kennelly next Thursday afternoon in the Hotel Roosevelt.

The Manhattan properties are 29-31 West 125th Street, two five-story brick business buildings; 2,100-02 Second Avenue, northeast corner of 108th Street, five-story apartment house with seven stores; 124-128 East 107th Street, a six-story apartment house; 2,201-2,203 First Avenue, a six-story forty-family tenement house with four stores; 337 Riverside Drive, southeast corner of 106th Street, a five-story brick dwelling; 136-142 West Ninety-ninth Street, four five-story double flats; and a vacant plot 50 by 100 feet on the north side of West 133d Street, between Broadway and Amsterdam Avenue.

Bronx parcels in the sale comprise twelve vacant lots on Layton Avenue, Dean Avenue and Shore Drive, in the Pelham Bay section. In the Malba section of Queens, the plot of seven lots, at the southwest corner of West Boulevard and Twentieth Street, will be sold, as well as 1,303-11-15 Twenty-eighth Street, Queens, three six-room dwellings.

The eighteenth annual appeal for the Hundred Neediest Cases is made today.

SAFE INVESTMENT IN REAL ESTATE

Security Shown, Says J. P. Day, by Insurance Companies and Savings Banks.

BIG FUND IN MORTGAGES

Sees Little Chance for Loss in New York Property Bought at Fair Price.

For safety of principal and stability of income no one can overlook real estate, the oldest and most fundamental type of investment, points out Joseph P. Day, in referring to the recent stock market deflation. The decline in values on the Stock Exchange, he says, has taught thousands of people that getting rich quick is as difficult a job as it ever was. It has taught others who had previously been "lucky" in the market that staying rich by continuing to follow get-rich-quick methods is just about impossible.

"The best evidence that I know of concerning the gilt-edge quality of real estate," says Mr. Day, "is furnished by the mutual life insurance companies and mutual savings banks of the United States.

"Not every one realizes that these institutions have no stock and no stockholders, but are actually owned by their policyholders and depositors. All operating profits accrue to them, and after adequate reserve provisions, are paid to them in dividends. These companies are directed by boards of trustees who cannot profit from their management except to the extent that they themselves are policyholders or depositors. Furthermore, State and Federal laws narrowly restrict the investments permissible to life insurance companies and savings banks to only the safest and most conservative types.

Mortgage Investments.

"The following figures are therefore significant: On Dec. 31, 1928, the 331 mutual life insurance companies in the United States had total assets of $15,961,093,741. Of this amount $6,760,792,001, or 42.4 per cent was invested in first mortgages on real estate.

"On July 1, 1929, the 149 mutual savings banks of New York State had total assets of $5,002,720,469. Of this amount $3,224,597,950, or 64.4 per cent, was invested in first mortgages on real estate.

"These enormous real estate investments are not only among the safest that the law and conscientious management can discover but they pay a higher rate of income return than can be obtained from other so-called gilt-edge securities. I have no precise figures on this but I am confident that this return averages between 5 and 6 per cent.

"Naturally, when people thought they could get rich overnight in the stock market, the 4½ per cent interest dividends paid by the savings bank did not look very exciting. Savings banks as a whole have not been going ahead the way they should this past year, but I predict that we shall now witness their return to the favor they deserve.

"As the figures I have quoted show, a large proportion of the money invested in a life insurance policy or a savings bank account goes into real estate.

"It is not human nature to want to play safe all the time, and many investors keep a speculative fund 'to play with,' to satisfy that urge to take a risk for the sake of possible large rewards. In fact, it is only because somebody is willing to take a chance that we make progress of any kind. In my opinion the average man has a far better prospect of making money in a real estate speculation than in taking a 'flier' in Wall Street.

"Real estate is infinitely simpler for the average man to understand than stocks and bonds. He can see it, measure it and judge for himself the prosperity or future of its neighborhood. Real estate values are not subject to manipulation, nor to short selling, nor to sudden changes of any kind. Finally, as far as New York City real estate is concerned, I think it is the greatest bull market of them all, ever since the Dutch bought the island of Manhattan for $24.

"If the general history of real estate values in this city is any criterion it is safe to say that practically any New York City property selected with a fair degree of intelligence and bought at a fair price, should in a few years make money for the purchaser."

Talk on Building Outlook.

"The Outlook in the Building Industry in the Metropolitan District for 1930" will be the topic of W. C. Clark, vice president of S. W. Straus & Co., when he addresses the members of the Credit Association of the Building Trades of New York, Tuesday, Dec. 17, in the Hotel McAlpin.

What it means to own this entire floor

Each apartment at 780 Park Avenue will have 85 feet of southern exposure and 88 feet of eastern exposure—for there will be only one apartment on a floor. Besides the added sun and cross-ventilation, this arrangement means larger rooms, better planned, and more privacy. Either of the two large passenger elevators leaves you in your own entrance hall. Then, in this 16-room apartment you will step into a wide gallery 36 feet long opening into an east living room 32 feet long. There will be six bedrooms, four facing south. Such an arrangement of rooms is possible only with one apartment on a floor. Apartments will vary in size, from 10 to 18 rooms. Some have already been sold. Rosario Candela, Architect; Charles Newmark, Builder; Shreve, Lamb & Harmon, Purchasers' Representatives. To be finished next summer. 100% co-operative. These are the town houses of 1930

The entrance doorway is interesting and informal. The overdoor balcony suggests a private house.

The architect of these apartments has taken the best from the town house... tall ceilings, the winding staircases, the private-house feeling... and added more generous room dimensions, more fireplaces, more light and air, larger bathrooms, dressing rooms and numerous generous-sized closets. He has made them what town houses should be. The 15-room duplex on the 6th and 7th floors has a large reception hall with a winding staircase, a corner living room 20 feet by 30 feet with tall balconied windows both on 73rd Street and on Park Avenue. A corner dining room is 21 feet long. Two of the five bedrooms are corner rooms and three face the east.

Many living rooms and dining rooms have balconied windows overlooking Park Avenue and 73rd Street.

The master's suite of a special 14-room duplex has a bedroom, boudoir, 2 bathrooms, a dressing room and 7 closets. The 7-room duplexes have loggias with a 200 foot view to the south. The typical 11-room simplex has five corner exposures. Duplexes from 7 to 15 rooms—many with terraces. Simplexes of 11 and 13 rooms, with loggias above the 4th floor. Rosario Candela, Architect. Edgar A. Levy Construction Co., Builders. Plans may be changed now to suit special requirements. 100% co-operative. To be finished next summer. The prices are really reasonable.

PRIZE-WINNING DESIGN A DARING DEPARTURE FROM RECOGNIZED HOUSE PLANNING

BEDROOM, dressing room and bath en suite, as seen in the owner's sleeping quarters of this prize-winning house design, marks a tendency toward more formal human relationships even in the intimacies of marriage. Something of the psychological need for occasional aloneness is sensed in this arrangement, a natural desire in the complex lives of modern people.

Privacy of individuals, once the privilege only of the wealthier class, now becomes an accepted fact among home owners of moderate income.

Occuping a full second floor wing, the master's suite includes a bedroom of such fine proportions that the twin beds, spaces for which are allotted on the drawings, become mere incidental furnishings.

Its occupants may enjoy the early-morning beauty of their garden from the broad bank of windows on one side. If the house is oriented as the architect has suggested, the first rays of the sun will venture into the room through this garden window. Comfortable sleeping even in midsummer should be possible to the normal person in this chamber, for windows on opposite walls provide cross ventilation.

Both dressing room and bath are amply lighted by windows during the daytime and by electric lighting at night. A door connects two rooms, occupants passing through the dressing room to get to the bathroom. Built-in cabinets and a closet in the dressing room help to keep the bedroom itself clear of the untidy litter

Painted White Walls of Common Brick Catch Colorful Shadows When the Sun Plays Upon This House Exterior. Fred J. Abendroth, Architect of Cleveland, Ohio, Designed This Compact Dwelling of Six Rooms, Two Baths, First-Floor Lavatory and Attached Garage, Including the Whole Within 30,580 Cubic Feet. It Won an Award in the Ohio-Kentucky Regional Contest of the 1929 National Better Homes Architectural Competition Conducted by Home Owners Institute.

Bedroom, Dressing Room and Bath Comprise the Owner's Suite Over the Living Room. Logical Approach to This House Is by Motor, for an Automobile Driveway and the Garage Dominate the Street Front. Rainy Afternoons Will Be Enjoyed by the Children of the Family in Their Own Little Playroom Over the Garage. A Recreation Room in the Basement, Amply Aired Through Steel Casement Windows and Warmed by Its Own Fireplace, Offers Additional Entertainment Facilities to the Home Owner.

of clothing. The man of the house will appreciate the balanced electric lighting over the lavatory, for lights on two sides dispel shadows and make the daily shave a simpler task.

30,580 Cubic Feet Includes Garage.

Fred J. Abendroth, architect, of Cleveland, Ohio, designed this house of six rooms, two baths, first-floor lavatory and attached garage, including the whole within a cubage of 30,580 cubic feet. It won an award of $500 in the Ohio-Kentucky regional contest of the 1929 National Better Homes Architectural Competition conducted by Home Owners Institute.

Concerning the house design and the inclusion of the garage in it, Mr. Abendroth says: "Our way of living, and consequently our home planning, has been greatly changed by the automobile. Therefore it appears to me that the garage should be incorporated into the house, although some city fire ordinances do not permit this.

"In this house a fire wall of common brick masonry separates house from the two-car garage, insuring fire safety in this section. An entry hall leads from garage to house.

"Where only a small house is built and only a narrow lot available, the garage may well be placed at the front. The entire rear of the lot is thereby used to its best advantage for garden, lawn or children's playground.

"A paved entrance court such as distinguishes this house acts as automobile approach for both family and visitors. It is also an ample turn-around and parking space for visitors' cars."

The house design itself is a daring departure from the recognized method of planning in that it is practically a house which is logically approached by automobile. A foot-path is usually provided where people are expected to walk. Yet this house is approached only by a driveway. Hence, people are apparently expected to arrive in cars.

This fact suggests that the house is especially appropriate for an outlying suburb rather than for a thickly populated district. Private motor travel brings friends for an evening who live at points ten or fifteen miles distant; and this house provides generously for their reception.

The entrance court of the old-time inn is brought up to date in this walled-in driveway. Cement or bluestone may be chosen as its material, the latter presenting a more striking appearance than the former but requiring periodic care by home owner or hired help.

No particular architectural style is followed in this house design. Rather it exemplifies the modern tendency to disclaim precedent.

Shadow Play on Walls.

Painted white brick walls give a texture of unusual beauty to this house exterior; an effect quite different from stucco in the same color. In the brick wall units of a certain size are suggested by the little shadows at the break of mortar joints. When trees surround the house, their shadows, too, strike against such walls in pleasing and sometimes grotesque designs.

With these light-toned masonry walls, door and window trim and roof must provide color for the house ensemble. Colorful rigid asbestos shingles may well be used as roofing. Chimney pots atop the flues of the two chimneys may be as gay in hue as taste dictates. Apple green for entrance door and window trim will harmonize with the roof deck over the bay window, for this is of copper, weathering after six or eight months to a soft green. Garage doors match the house walls.

Tucked between garage and living room wing is the entrance door protected by these interesting walls. It opens onto a hall through which one may pass to kitchen, to dining room or to living room. In it is a closet for coats and hats and a conveniently placed lavatory. Isolated as this lavatory is in the house corner, the noise of plumbing will not annoy either family or guests. It is lighted by a tiny window.

Living Room Separated.

The expedient of devoting an entire wing of the house to the living room and master's suite above it avoids the possibility of annoying sleepers in the rear bedrooms by late gatherings in the living room. Since the owner of the house and his wife must always act as host and hostess when visitors are present in the living room, their empty bedroom immediately above will scarcely complain of late music and the cheerful, hearty good-byes after the last rubber. Youngsters or grandma or grown-up daughter, sleeping in the rear bedrooms, will not be disturbed for the separation of the rooms protects them.

Through a bay window in the living room one may look out into the automobile drive and see who is coming in the Ford or the Cadillac pulling into the entrance court. A large fireplace with bookcases on either side occupies one of the shorter walls. In case another house is built on the lot immediately adjoining, this house turns a blank wall to the neighbor's kitchen or dining room; yet ample light enters the living room from two sides. Good wall space for large pieces of furniture such as davenport or secretary is found in that wall between living and dining room.

A window and a glass door admitting to the flagstone terrace overlook the garden, which will have its attractions for the lover of outdoors even in bleak Winter. When a lot of considerable depth makes it possible to develop the lawn at the rear as suggested by the architect in his plot layout, this terrace will be an attractive feature. With awning or umbrella over it, it will be a cool and pleasant spot for afternoon tea in warm weather.

Service of either tea or after dinner coffee on the terrace is facilitated by a door which opens from the dining room onto this terrace. A broad bank of windows in the dining room overlooks the garden.

Breakfast Nook Faces East.

Breakfast nook, connecting dining room and kitchen, acts in part as a pantry. If the house is oriented as the architect suggests, the breakfast nook will face toward the east and the morning light which floods into it will give commuting dad and school children a cheery start-off for the day.

Although windows are found on only one wall of the kitchen, cross ventilation is effected by currents of air through the breakfast nook. All the equipment essential to the efficient modern kitchen is fitted into the kitchen which measures 12 feet 9 inches by 9 feet 6 inches.

Next to the range is a broad built-in cupboard where china is kept. Grocery orders are given over the telephone, which may be placed in this room at the owner's option, for the entire house is wired with telephone conduits so placed within the walls that unsightly and inconvenient wires will not mar the appearance of any room.

Pots and pans have a little closet of their own. Brooms and mops, too, are kept in the separate closet in the service entry. A double drain board sink under the window is flanked on one side by a cupboard and on the other by an electric refrigerator. Dirty tea towels and mussed table linens are dropped down a monel metal clothes chute to the laundry in the basement, while trash and garbage are easily disposed of through the hopper door to the incinerator situated in the service entry.

Access to the garage is obtained through a passageway and a door, which may be of steel to supplement the fire safe qualities of the masonry fire wall already mentioned. Mechanically operated garage doors will be of especial convenience in this garage. If a lock which controls these doors is placed in one of the posts at the opening to the entrance court no one need get out into rain or cold to usher the car into its shelter. The driver would merely stick his hand out the car window unlock the post lock and by the time he drove to the garage he would find its doors open.

Children's Playroom.

Children have a happy faculty of making good use of any room which is truly theirs. Over the garage is a space which may well be converted into a playroom for the youngsters of the family. Its long, sloping ceilings with very low walls at either end will appeal to the small child, for the room will seem to fit his tiny stature. A broader window may be substituted for the present narrow one. Such a room would be very attractive and comfortable if lined with insulating board. The insulating qualities of the board will help keep the room warm on stormy Winter days and the youngsters themselves will decorate it periodically with colored paper dolls and pictures which they may cull from any magazine or Sunday newspaper. Thumb-tacks push into such a board with ease.

Family fortunes and even family personnel change. In ten years the children may have deserted their little playroom for a college dormitory. But this space will still be useful as living quarters. If a maid is empoyed, she might be housed here most comfortably.

Entrance to this play space or storage space, in case the family has no very young members, is obtained from the second floor of the house. In addition to the owner's suite already described, two other bedrooms serviced by a bathroom between them are on this second floor. The stair hall is lighted by a window over the entrance door, natural lighting of the stair hall always being advisable as a preventative to tripping on the stairs. Linens are kept in an ample linen closet in the hall.

In the basement of this house a recreation room of the same size as the living room occupies the space under the living room and supplements the entertainment facilities of the home owner. Here dad may indulge in a game of poker or chess with old friends until far into the night. Heavy cigar smoke will not spoil expensive draperies nor will loud masculine talk and laughter disturb light sleepers. Tile or cement will be effective as a flooring and will be easily cleaned after such a home smoker.

Under the dining room is situated the laundry. This is of good size, is well lighted by steel basement windows and contains three free standing laundry trays. Because these trays stand out from the wall the laundress or the housewife who does her own laundry, can approach them from any of the four sides—a decided advantage. A closet into which the clothes chute deposits soiled pieces from upstairs holds all clothing until washday arrives.

Extra supplies of fruits and vegetables are stored in the fruit room, an especially good place for the Winter barrel of apples.

Oil or gas burner is suggested as the proper heating equipment, but a fuel room is also provided. Coal may be dropped through its window on the entrance court. If automatic heating is used, this fuel room may serve entirely as a depository for wood for the two fireplaces. It will be particularly convenient for the fireplace in the recreation room. A special sheet metal unit in this fireplace makes it possible to warm this basement room on chilly, damp evenings in late Spring when the furnace of the house is not burning.

Arthur Bates Lincoln, consulting architect, estimates that this house may be built in the neighborhood of New York City for about $18,000. Blueprint working drawings and specifications ready to build from are now being prepared and will be available shortly. They can be obtained at nominal cost by addressing Small Homes Bureau, care of THE NEW YORK TIMES. Please refer to Plan 41.

EVICTION DAMAGES IN COURT RULING

Lessor Is Held Responsible, Although He Had Sold the Property.

NEW OWNER DEFAULTED

Previous Rulings Cited in Support of Decision Favoring Ousted Tenant.

The Court of Appeals has just decided that when the owner of real estate mortgages it and thereafter leases the premises with a covenant for peaceful enjoyment, then sells the property, and the new owner fails to pay interest and causes a foreclosure, the original owner remains liable in damages because the tenant was ousted before the expiration of the term.

The decision, which reversed a ruling of the lower courts in favor of the defendant in an action of Philip Ganz against Raymond S. Clark, and ordered a new trial, was based on an opinion by Judge O'Brien who said that the defendant, as owner of property in New York City, mortgaged it and shortly afterward leased it to the plaintiff for five years with a renewal term for five more, the lease containing a covenant for quiet enjoyment. The defendant paid the interest as long as he held title but the person to whom he sold it, after receiving rent from the plaintiff for four months, defaulted. The mortgage was foreclosed and the plaintiff evicted. Both lower courts found against the plaintiff.

Judge O'Brien's decision states that the lessor made a "solemn covenant" that his lessee might "peaceably and quietly have, hold and enjoy the said demised premises for the term aforesaid," and promised "that for five years, or at the plaintiff's election, for ten years, the tenant should be free from disturbance in his possession of the premises." The opinion continued:

"His promise was not conditional upon his retention of title nor upon the lessee's ignorance of the existence of the mortgage nor upon refusal to pay rent to the grantee. Without qualification the compact was made. Its obligation has not been fulfilled. Unless the weightiest reason be advanced whereby its breach may be condoned, the conclusion must follow that the agreement shall be enforced or a penalty paid for its violation.

"When the owner of real estate pledges that for ten years his tenant shall be free from eviction he assumes a heavy burden. Yet, on the other hand, the tenant, if he were put at the mercy of one who fails to perform acts necessary for the protection which he has undertaken to provide, would be compelled to support a load even more oppressive.

"By a short term lease the owner may keep his liability within narrow bounds. He will not be allowed to secure the benefit of a long term lease with a short term liability. Merely because he divests himself of title he cannot be heard to cast off his responsibility. Respondent rejects the application of a rule of such straightforward simplicity and argues that, unless the covenantee proves the covenantor guilty of bad faith or unfair dealing either in the making or in the breach of the covenant and also proves advance payment of rent, no damages may be recovered."

Judge O'Brien said that the Court of Appeals in Mack vs. Patchin recognized the rule that where an implied covenant for quiet enjoyment is broken the tenant is entitled to recover, and that the only question in such action relates to the measure of damages. Chief Judge Earl wrote in the case cited:

"When he gave this lease, if he acted in good faith, he must have intended in some way to have taken care of these mortgages, and because he did not do so, having the ability, so far as appears, to do so, he should be held liable to the damages recoverable."

The same court cited this decision as authority in matter of Strassburger and said that if the breach of the covenants for quiet enjoyment had resulted from the fault of the lessor, the measure of damages would be the value of the unexpired lease less the rents reserved. That lessor had become insane and his breach "resulted not from his fault but from his misfortune." The court ruled that if he had remained sane and had refused to protect his covenants, the damages for the breach would have been measured by the rule in Mack vs. Patchin.

Judge O'Brien's opinion concluded:

"When a lessor covenants for quiet enjoyment, he is bound to take such measures in relation to the mortgage as will enable him to accomplish the purpose of his covenant. His promise survives his divestment of title. If he is at fault in failing to provide payment of interest on the mortgage, even after he has ceased to hold title to the premises, he must answer for his fault. His interest in the lease continues to the extent of his covenant and he will not be allowed to abandon the obligations which he has assumed. He is liable for the loss of the bargain."

WANTS SUFFOLK ZONED.

F. J. Dolan Jr. Suggests Better Development in County.

A suburban territory like Suffolk County, which is coming more and more within the purview of the metropolitan area, should be subjected to some definite system of official subdivision and map system that would insure the proper development and zoning of home and business sites therein in conformity with county and town growth, according to F. J. Dolan Jr., developer.

"For example, a highway map or plan could be adopted insuring the development of the eastern part of Suffolk County, as well as the rest of Long Island east of the city line, regardless of village limitations," Mr. Dolan said.

"By the State stepping in and projecting a parkway system along the ocean front of Long Island, from Jones Beach State Park eastward to Southampton, it has determined the topographical character of that Long Island outpost for all time. When the parkway there is completed, the land developer will know the plan whereby he can intelligently lay down streets, sidewalks and intersections. The State surveys through Ocean Bay Park, opposite Bay Shore, for example, already indicate to the developers of that stretch of ocean front just what can best be done in the way of creating a general street system which is beyond the province of village or city.

"But, regardless of the ocean-front region, which has exceptional topographical conditions, a definite town and county plan of subdivision should be made possible. Westchester County has exemplified the idea, to a degree, in its county parkway system."

The Early Bird Gets the First Worm

DID you read my two Ads. calling attention to the fact that no speculative houses have been built for a year?

One other large concern, the best in the business (outside of myself, I hope) has just advertised in the same way, saying that they have built some houses on their own money and not on borrowed money that could not be borrowed.

But there is no doubt of it, the speculative builder of cheap (and bad) houses is out of business; and those who want new houses now have only a few, and luckily good, houses to choose from, and the early bird will get the first worm.

Our houses are good houses and still priced at cost —$11,500 to $17,500—in the part of Queens County endowed by nature with her choicest gifts, the Highlands of Queens.

We have less than two dozen houses left overlooking Hillside Avenue and adjoining the new Hillside Park. Come see our brick colony at

"SELL IT and sell it QUICK"
Says the owner of this Scarsdale Home.
So here comes a real opportunity to get a bargain—this home has an ACRE OF GROUND (that's 43,560 sq. feet, and Scarsdale land is selling from 75 cents to $1.00 per sq. ft.)—and it has 5 master sleeping rooms (another feature almost impossible to get at reasonable cost). It is in a 100% residential neighborhood; it is thoroughly modern and complete in every respect; the owner is NOT going to Europe or South or to California—he just needs the money more than the house, so he will sell it for less than $50,000—the price was $65,000. There's nothing like it in Scarsdale for value.

REVIEWS CHANGES IN LOWER FIFTH AV.

A. L. Aiken of New York Life Forecasts New Era of Growth.

MORE BUILDINGS PLANNED

Empire State and Metropolitan Life Skyscrapers to Change Skyline Below Thirty-fourth Street.

Recent growth of Fifth Avenue below Thirty-fourth Street and the outlook for expanded business and building operations in that section were reviewed by Alfred L. Aiken, second vice president of the New York Life Insurance Company, in an address recently before the Below Thirty-fourth Street Committee of the Fifth Avenue Association.

The skyline of lower Fifth Avenue has undergone important changes in late years, and building projects either underway or definitely projected are due to bring an even greater transformation of the area in the years just ahead, Mr. Aiken predicted. He enumerated the important transit links built and building to serve the district and listed the large office skyscrapers and store buildings which are in prospect, in addition to new apartments at the extreme southern end of the thoroughfare.

"Fifth Avenue for some blocks below Forty-second Street and up to Fifty-ninth Street already has been intensively developed," he pointed out. "Its further development on the north is arrested by the residential community facing Central Park, and while business does spread itself to the east and west through the cross streets, there is at present and will be during the longest lives of any of us, a very real advertising value to a Fifth Avenue location, as long as Fifth Avenue remains as it is today, one of the greatest shopping thoroughfares of the world.

"As to the present desirability of space in the neighborhood, may I refer to our own experience? We planned an occupancy of the building for our own use of practically all the space from the second to the fourteenth floors inclusive and we provided, for future use but to be rented for the immediate future, 178,000 square feet from the fourteenth to the thirty-fourth floor. There were many discussions as to the rentability of this space and many doubts expressed as to the demand for space in the immediate neighborhood at rentals that would justify the investment in the building.

"Our experience has more than justified the hopes of the optimists. Our areas for rental were equal to those of an office building of substantial size, and we were told that it ordinarily took from one to two years to complete the rental of such space. We have been in possession and occupancy of our building for exactly a year to a day. Over 80 per cent of the rentable areas have been leased at prices already substantially in excess of those upon which we based our estimates of the earning capacity of the building; and we could easily have filled it completely had we been willing to rent the remaining desirable spaces upon the terms of the leases of our earliest tenants. With this experience in a great, new, modern building, it is not difficult to appreciate the optimism of others as evidenced by the recent building operations in this zone and those contemplated for the future.

"Within the last five years there have been twenty-two major building operations in the territory between Twenty-third and Thirty-fourth Streets. Those buildings, including our own, represent an investment of probably $45,000,000 and, satisfied with the wisdom of the judgment of these builders, plans for the Empire State Building to take the place of the old Waldorf-Astoria Hotel, are well on their way, and although Governor Smith can tell you better than I what this represents in the way of an investment, I have been told that it means not less than $50,000,000. Our neighbors, the Metropolitan, are contemplating a very large improvement for their own use and occupancy on their properties on Madison Square, and while I have heard no estimate of the cost of this improvement, it must inevitably involve many millions of dollars."

STANDARD LEASE FORMS.

Plan to Establish System for Apartments and Lofts.

Following the successful results of the adoption of a standard form of office building lease by the Building Managers' and Owners' Association of New York, the Apartment House and the Loft Divisions of the Rental Conditions Committee in the organization are now working on a plan to regulate their lease forms by a standard basis.

Lee Thompson Smith, secretary of Pease & Elliman, and who is chairman of the rental conditions committee, has discussed the subject with the members of the apartment house group, of which Charles J. Quinlan, vice president of the association and of Wood, Dolson Company, is chairman, and the loft buildings division, of which Maurice R. Spear, president of Spear & Co., is the head. Both divisions have submitted recommendations to Joseph F. Mann, counsel for the association, for drafting standard forms.

DECLARES DIVIDEND.

Builders Capital Corporation Says 1930 Outlook Is Bright.

A dividend of 25 cents a share has been declared by the Builders Capital Corporation of Westchester County, payable on or about Jan. 10, 1930, to all stockholders of record Dec. 31, 1929, by action of the directors' meeting in White Plains. The payment constitutes the fifth consecutive dividend since Oct. 1, 1927—in addition to a stock dividend of 100 per cent given in 1927.

The firm was organized in 1926 with approximately $10[illegible],000 paid-in capital for the purpose of dealing in small instalment real estate mortgages. The capital is now $500,000 and the assets as of Oct. 31, 1929, were given as $583,836.86. George S. Morrow is president.

The officers of the corporation have predicted that the real estate and mortgage business will show a decided improvement throughout the county in 1930.

The eighteenth annual appeal for the Hundred Neediest Cases is made today.

EXTOLS VALUE OF MAPS.

Dr. Bowie Stresses Need of Exact Data in Unsettled Areas.

The surveyor's transit rod and the airplane are supplanting the covered wagon and the pick and shovel of the early pioneer in present-day opening-up of the unsettled areas of North and South America, according to Dr. William Bowie of Washington, D. C., speaking recently in Mexico City at the opening session of the Pan-American Institute of Geography and History. Dr. Bowie, one of three delegates from the United States to the first meeting of the newly organized institute, was designated by the National Geographic Society. He is Chief of the Division of Geodesy of the United States Coast and Geodetic Survey.

Maps which give precise locations, elevations and other topographic information constitute the framework of further surveys of forest, mineral, plant, animal, water-power and other forms of potential wealth, the speaker explained.

"Therefore the engineers and other leaders in industry are making their wants known in regard to topographic mapping," he continued. "It has truly been said that only a rich nation can afford to develop its natural resources and its industries without previously having executed the topographic surveying and mapping. Thus are avoided wasteful mistakes of the past in road-building and railway construction by routes which are circuitous and in areas which have not the latent resources or are too far from markets to be profitable."

A major program of the institute is the coordination of topographic surveys already made independently, and stimulation of map-making programs of the governments themselves.

Another imperative demand for mapping of hitherto unexplored areas arises from the commercial airplane lines, Dr. Bowie said, for airplanes now are using routes over tracts which know neither the highways nor the steel rail.

"We have heard much in recent decades of the application of scientific principles to agriculture and other great industries in exchange of goods and in communication," he asserted. "But science can only go a certain distance toward bettering the condition of humanity and making civilization nobler without having geographic facts. It is here that the geographer must supplement the work of the physicist, the chemist and the engineer. For without geographical information and background the other sciences cannot be efficiently employed in the utilization of the resources which nature has given abundantly to the nations of the world.

"The officials of the National Geographic Society have expressed frequently, and do on this occasion through me, their opinion that civilization will be greatly advanced by an early completion of the mapping of the world.

"We all should like to see the day when there is an adequate topographical map covering the area of each of the countries in the Western Hemisphere. Much mapping has been done in my country, but only 13 per cent of the United States has as yet been topographically surveyed, and many of the map-sheets are inadequate to meet the modern needs of agriculture, mining, development of hydroelectric power and extension of transportation and communication systems."

JARED FLAGG BONDS SOURCE OF TROUBLE

Court Comments on Objectionable Methods in His Realty Financing.

MORTGAGE TRUSTEE WINS

Case Involved $20,000 First Lien Claim Against Property on West Side.

By a recent decision of the Appellate Division the mortgage manipulations of Jared Flagg, of "Flagg's Flats" fame, who died on Aug. 26, 1928, in the office of the Attorney General while he was being questioned on the subject, are held to have no effect on the rights of the holders of bonds based on the mortgages of the Jared Flagg Corporation. The court, in an opinion by Justice O'Malley, upheld a suit by J. W. Kaufman as trustee for bondholders of the corporation, and Fannie H. Rorbach, suing in behalf of herself and other bondholders, against the corporation and others, impleaded with the West Side Savings Bank and Alfred W. Levi, and modified a judgment of the lower court.

The decision held that where a trust mortgage is executed and recorded for $20,000, although pursuant to an agreement it was to be for a sum not exceeding $65,000, and, later, $60,000 of bonds being sold, after second and third mortgages were placed on the property by the trustee, when he executed agreements subordinating the trust mortgage to the second and third mortgages, the $20,000 mortgage was valid and entitled to priority over the second and third mortgages, notwithstanding the subordination, because the trustee had no expressed power to execute the agreement, and such power could not be implied. The court also held as to the excess over $20,000, since there was nothing on record to inform the subsequent mortgagor of the excess, that the bonds in excess of $20,000 are subordinated to the second and third mortgages.

Involved Financing.

Justice O'Malley said that the suit was brought to foreclose a so-called $20,000 trust mortgage and so-called $40,000 equitable mortgage. The question presented was whether they were subordinate to a consolidated mortgage owned by the savings bank and four mortgages owned by Levi. The lower court held that they were subordinate with the result that the bank got priority over all others, while Levi's were found superior to those of the plaintiff, and a decree foreclosing his mortgages was granted, with the right to the plaintiffs to share in any surplus. In their appeal the plaintiffs asserted priority over all others. Describing Flagg's manipulations, Justice O'Malley said:

"In 1921 the Jared Flagg Corporation was the creature of one Jared Flagg and was the owner of 12-14 West Sixty-eighth Street, which was partly covered by an old four-story private house. The litigation arises from the unscrupulous methods employed by Flagg to finance the carrying and improvement of such premises."

The court said that the Flagg Corporation sold bonds until on April 17, 1922, about $19,000 were outstanding. The agreement between the corporation and the bond purchasers was that a mortgage would be executed covering the property not exceeding $65,000. During that year and 1923 the corporation sold additional bonds. The plaintiff Kaufman, by appointment of the court, was successor trustee to Jared Flagg and Henry A. Jackson, originally named in the agreement, while the plaintiff Rorbach was a bondholder.

The Flagg Corporation neglected the duty of recording a mortgage sufficient to satisfy all the bonds. The plaintiffs' trust mortgage of $20,000 was the one recorded, while the defendant's mortgages are subsequent in time and on their face junior liens both to the plaintiffs' recorded and equitable mortgages, the first being dated Feb. 24, 1924.

Mortgage Validity.

"The validity of the plaintiffs' mortgage must therefore be recognized," said Justice O'Malley. "So, too, it has been established that the mortgage of record was given to secure the bonds here sued upon, and the other facts above detailed have been found.

"The evidence shows that when the first of the defendants' mortgages was being placed, Flagg, either by direct statement, by silence in hearing of such statement by other parties, or both, declared that no consideration had been given for plaintiffs' recorded mortgage; that it had been recorded for convenience of future financing; that no bonds had been issued or sold; that the Flagg Corporation still controlled it and that it could be subordinated. In reliance upon these representations defendants' first mortgage was taken upon the execution and delivery of a subordination agreement giving priority over plaintiffs' recorded mortgage.

"In our view the burden of proving authority in Flagg and Jackson, as trustees, and in Flagg alone, as sole surviving trustee, was upon these defendants. They have clearly failed to sustain such burden."

Concerning the plaintiffs' so-called $40,000 equitable mortgage, the court remarked that "a different situation is presented," and in outlining it said:

"We do not see how these defendants were called upon to make further inquiry with respect to any obligation resting upon the Flagg Corporation or upon Flagg except as indicated on the recorded trust mortgage. Under it the obligations were apparently limited to the sum of $20,000. There was nothing to put the defendants on notice that the Flagg Corporation might have issued bonds in excess of such, and that it should have mortgaged the property as security for the additional amount, or that Flagg, as trustee, should have seen that this had been done. Such additional obligations were known to the holders of the bonds or bond receipts.

"The existence or identity of these holders would not be disclosed by public records, nor were the bonds held by them a matter of record. The dereliction of the Flagg Corporation and Flagg was known to them, or at least should have been known. In these circumstances, we think, the fault, if any, lies with them, and that the resulting injury should not be caused to rest upon the defendants, who were in the position of innocent third parties.

"The defendants' mortgages, valid and recorded, should under the circumstances, therefore, be given precedence over the plaintiffs' equitable mortgage."

RISKS ARE ANALYZED IN BUILDING CREDITS

Several Types of Deals Offer Problems to the Sub-Contractor.

Several types of contracts which offer financial problems for the subcontractors in the building trades are analyzed by I. L. Martin, secretary of the General Bronze Corporation, in a statement issued through the Credit Association of the Building Trades of New York.

The first type is the operation where the owner is sound financially, he pointed out, but the contractor is small and has no liquid assets, and there is only a small percentage of equity in the building. The second type is where there is little tangible information. The credit of the individuals is more or less stable, banks give substantial rating, but the corporation limits the liability of protection in that building. The third case is that of the speculative builder, who enters upon a contract and his financial resources are satisfactory, but he is only acting as agent for the owner. In that event there is no obligation to the owner for any indebtedness on that building.

"These types offer important difficulties in arriving at satisfactory credit plans," Mr. Martin said. "No matter how honest a contractor may be, if his finances are limited there are unforeseen hazards that he may encounter. The only protection on such a job as this is a careful study of the contractor's experience in the past, his reliability and accuracy in calculation; that with his integrity, is a reasonable hazard.

"Under the lien law the owner is not liable to a greater extent than unpaid moneys still due the contractor on a building. Therefore, for one who is at the tail-end of a job, if he is not very alert, the retained percentage money may not be sufficient to protect his claim. If the project then has a set-up of a speculative nature there should be added to one's investigation the determination of the nature of the surety bond given the owner by the contractor for the completion of the work.

"The most difficult of the subcontractor's problems is that of speculative buildings being carried out by a responsible general contractor who, however, is acting as agent of the project. Therefore your security lies in the responsibility of the owner and not of the general contractor. It seems to me a very difficult proposition to make the general contractors in these instances realize the position of the subs. The general contractor participates in the profit of the building on the successful completion of the enterprise. The sub does not participate. He is dependent on the profit he can make on his work and should not be called on to back any speculative proposition whatsoever. I insist that the contractor add his guarantee to that of the owner in the execution of a contract or make available to me the financial set-up of that building operation."

FARM-MORTGAGE DEBT GAIN.

Slight Increase Is Reported in Three Years' Survey.

The total amount of farm mortgage indebtedness in the United States on Jan. 1, 1928, was about $108,000,000, or about 1 per cent greater than on Jan. 1, 1925, says the Bureau of Agricultural Economics of the United States Department of Agriculture. It is estimated that on Jan. 1, 1928, the total was $9,468,000,000 compared with $9,360,000,000 on Jan. 1, 1925. In 1923 the bureau estimated that the total on Jan. 1, 1920, was $7,857,000,000. Figures for Jan. 1, 1929, are not yet available.

The recent estimates are based upon information received from more than 22,000 owners of farms in all sections of the United States and from bankers and county officials in a third of the agricultural counties and upon data from the 1925 census of agriculture.

On the total debt for 1928, that on owner-operated farms, including debt on that portion of part-owner farms owned by the operator, was $5,560,000,000; the debt on tenant-operated farms was $3,644,000,000, and the debt on manager-operated farms was $264,000,000. Corresponding estimates for 1925 are: Owner-operated farms, $5,504,000,000; tenant-operated, $3,612,000,000, and manager-operated, $243,000,000.

The largest increase in the amount of farm mortgage debt for the three-year period ending Jan. 1, 1928, was in the East North Central States, the Southern States, and the Pacific group. The South Atlantic States showed the greatest relative increase in debt, with lesser rates of increase in the East South Central, the West South Central, the East North Central, and the Pacific groups of States in the order mentioned.

Decreases in total mortgage debt in the three-year period are reported for New England, the Middle Atlantic, the West North Central, and the Mountain groups. Greatest relative decline occurred in the Mountain States, with the Middle Atlantic, the West North Central, and the New England groups showing successively smaller reductions.

The increase in debt for the country as a whole occurred under all forms of tenure. Within individual geographic divisions, the indebtedness increased in some tenure groups while in other groups it declined. Indebtedness of owner-operated farms showed increases in the East North Central, the South Atlantic, and the East and the West South Central areas. Largest increases of debt on farms operated by owners appeared in the South Central groups, with smaller increases in the South Atlantic and East North Central States. Decreases in debt on owner-operated farms occurred in the Mountain, Middle Atlantic, New England, Pacific, and West North Central States, the rate of decrease in those sections occurring in the order given.

APOLOGIZES FOR NOISE.

Irving Trust Tells Neighbors That Riveting Means Progress.

In a letter sent out to property owners and the occupants of buildings near the site of its projected skyscraper, the Irving Trust Company through Harry E. Ward, president, apologizes for the noise being made by the workmen at 1 Wall Street.

The letter reads as follows:

"May we hope that you will bear with us as patiently as possible during the unavoidably noisy weeks that lie just ahead while the steel frame of our headquarters building at 1 Wall Street is going up? To us, naturally enough, the sound of the riveting means gratifying progress toward completion of the building. To our neighbors it means a most unwelcome distraction.

"Realizing this and keenly regretting the necessity for it, we are glad to tell you our builder is pressing the work at top speed. His schedule and the present season of closed windows will at least minimize your discomfort."

PICKS NEW YORK AS CITY BEAUTIFUL

C. R. W. Nevinson, British Artist, Sees It as Leading the World in Esthetic Charm.

HE DESPISES ANTIQUITIES

Says City to Be Beautiful Must Have Living Present Based on a Hopeful Future.

Which is the most beautiful city in the world? C. R. W. Nevinson, the English artist, scouting the idea, widely held by some, that the cities of today cannot compare in estheticism with those of yesteryear, awards the bays to New York. To his mind the worship of antiquities signifies not good taste but hopelessness.

We are standing today, he prophesies, developing his thesis in an article contributed to The London Daily Chronicle, before the gates of wonderful new cities, to be built by engineers, scientists, architects and artists, which will make all the cities of the past and present "seem as squalid as a pigsty and as primitive as the cave in which man used to shelter."

"To many people," says Mr. Nevinson, "the phrase 'a beautiful city' implies an old city moldering with ruins, the achievements of the past, historical associations of the so-called good old days, a backwater of a faded glory, steeped in death and decay, picturesque and insanitary.

"Admittedly, all art is neither ancient nor modern. The architecture of Michelangelo, the painting of Botticelli, the music of Beethoven, the plays of Shakespeare, the style of the Bible, are as fine as ever they were; but a city to be beautiful must be the centre and citadel of contemporary life, much as the acting of an actor and the singing of a singer can only be appreciated by their contemporaries. In spite of guidebooks medievalists and other forms of pessimists, the cities of today are finer, and will be finer, than the plague-ridden, smelly, domestic conglomerations of the past.

Puritanism Blamed for Ugliness.

"Puritanism, especially the Victorian, regarding beauty as wickedness, has been responsible for the ghastly squalor of most of our hideous cities in England, and, therefore, for the bleak pessimism of those who despise all contemporary achievement and wallow in the worm-ridden junk left about by our ancestors of medieval times. All cities which are old and have no present have only a mummified beauty, being only a sentimental link with the past, seen, for the most part, through rose-colored Tennysonian spectacles.

"A beautiful city must have a living and active present, based on a hopeful future. Today, and probably for some years to come, the three centres of all human activity are London, Paris and New York; Paris, the centre of all esthetic and intellectual ideas, New York financially and mechanically dominant, and London the solid and sound centre of all the young countries of the world, who look to the English for guidance in all ideas and ideals which make up civilized constitutional society of today. Therefore it is among these three cities that the choice lies.

"New York, being the Venice of this epoch, has triumphed, thanks to its engineers and architects, as successfully as the Venetians did in their time. Both were inevitable as shipping centres, and both sites were utterly unsuitable by nature for cities.

"Where the Venetian drove stakes into his sandbanks to overcome nature, the American has pegged his city to the sky. No sight can be more exhilarating and beautiful than this triumph of man, who, for lack of space, has scrapped all the traditions.

American Debt to French Art.

"As American architects owe practically all their initial knowledge of architecture to the Beaux Arts of Paris and French tradition, there is no knowing that the brilliance of Corbusier, the great French architect, will not shine still more intensely in the near future in New York, a city where Americans have learned to scrap old medieval forms with an even greater agility than they scrap obsolete models of the internal combustion engine.

"Probably in a few years New York will have adapted and adopted the great modern architecture, interior decoration and plumbing of the French pioneers. Its houses will contain in beautiful form and color all the great mechanical, medical and practical achievements of this century.

"Anything is possible of realization in America today; that is why old New York is, I think, the most beautiful city.

"London will have to cease sprawling its one-storied shacks from sea to sea; it is already a country which gives a sense of claustrophobia from which there is no escape, thanks to the London County Council.

"What is terrifying about Paris is that the bourgeois will ignore their native genuis and produce a Berlin."

RENTING NEW BUILDINGS.

Demand for Space Given as Evidence of Trade Growth.

The nation-wide survey of rental conditions in office buildings in this country just completed by the National Association of Building Owners and Managers disclosed that 11.55 per cent of the total space is vacant, or 1.55 per cent above normal vacancy standards.

The figures, according to C. M. Turley of St. Louis, chairman of the rental conditions committe of the association, indicate that the great building booms of recent years "have not yet glutted the market." In fact, in Mr. Turley's opinion, the fact that 88.45 per cent of all office space in our cities is occupied despite the tremendous expansion of such facilities is a reflection of the continued growth of American business. The survey covered conditions as of Oct. 1 in thirty-eight principal cities.

"With the addition of millions of square feet of office space since the resumption of building activity shortly after the war, a great power of absorption of that space was necessary if a serious overbuilt condition was to be prevented," he added. "Just how far that power of absorption will go remains to be seen, and we will not be long in finding it out that since there are sixty-eight new buildings being constructed in the thirty-eight cities to bring on the market an additional 13,680,262 square feet of space.

"The figures should serve as a danger signal to capitalists, investment bankers and others who put their money in the new office building construction, to warn them that every project must be studied with meticulous care. No building should now be erected unless there is an actual need for office space in the city where the building is proposed."

Saw Forty-Second Street Grow For More Than Fifty Years

The Late F. W. Schoonmaker Rounded Out Record of Half Century as Merchant on That Thoroughfare—Witnessed Many Radical Changes.

Fifty-three years in business on Forty-second Street was the unique record of Frederick W. Schoonmaker, druggist, who died recently in Montclair, N. J., in his eighty-second year. For fifty-three years without a break Mr. Schoonmaker maintained his drug store on that thoroughfare, and, although improvements and other changes in the neighborhood caused him to move five times, always his succeeding store was within a few feet of his original place.

It was in December, 1874, that Mr. Schoonmaker opened his first drug store at 117 East Forty-second Street. And it was in November, 1927, that he opened his latest and largest quarters at 307 Madison Avenue. Although the frontage of his latest store was on Madison Avenue, there was an entrance to the store on Forty-second Street, thus giving his establishment the distinction of being a bona fide Forty-second Street institution, maintained without a break in the fifty-three years of its career.

His first store, at No. 117, was between Lexington Avenue and what was later known as Depew Place. During those days Mr. Schoonmaker lived at Forty-second Street and Prospect Terrace, the section now devoted to the group of apartment buildings known as Tudor City.

"Forty-second Street was beautiful," Mr. Schoonmaker once remarked. "It was shaded from Madison Avenue west by fine trees, and on the east of my location from Third Avenue, there was a field with a little white house on the corner of Lexington Avenue and Forty-third Street in which an old lady lived who had a herd of goats, for the milk was much used then. Opposite my first store was the wing of the old Grand Union Hotel, the main entrance being on Park Avenue. On the corner was the Riggs House, later absorbed by the Grand Union. On Forty-second Street, opposite my store, Arnold Roe had a restaurant patronized by hackmen. Where the Belmont stands a man kept a little all-night oyster house.

"Extending from Second Avenue up to the East River was a hill leading to Prospect Terrace, and on evenings the populace would gather at the top of the hill and watch the Boston and Harlem boats pass on the river."

The expansion of the Grand Central Station forced Mr. Schoonmaker to find other quarters, and he removed to 141 East Forty-second Street, east of Lexington Avenue. After a few years there the trend of business uptown again forced him out, and this time he located at the southeast corner of Park Avenue and Forty-second Street, now forming part of the Belmont Hotel site. This was in 1880, and he remained there for twenty-two years before he made his next move. It was in this location that his store acquired its greatest fame, and it was there that the first all-night telephone service was installed. Neighboring hotels used to display cards advising patrons to go to Schoonmaker's if they wanted to use the telephone at night.

In time this building went the way of the other buildings that had housed his establishment, and in 1901 Schoonmaker moved to 70 West Forty-second Street, in the Lincoln National Bank Building. Twenty-five years passed before Mr. Schoonmaker found it necessary to find new quarters, due to the bank structure being torn down to make way for the tall office building now on the site. This last removal, in 1927, brought the store to the Madison Avenue site, and it also marked the retirement of Mr. Schoonmaker from active participation in the business which he founded. He sold his interest to an associate, William S. Gordon, who had been connected with the Schoonmaker store for thirty-eight years.

During his half a century on Forty-second Street, Mr. Schoonmaker witnessed many startling changes in the Grand Central area. Among these were the enlargement and the final passing of the Grand Union Hotel, the building of the Manhattan, Belmont and Murray Hill hotels, followed later by the Commodore Hotel, the elimination of the elevated shuttle from Third Avenue to Grand Central Station and the remarkable changes that followed the completion of the new Grand Central Station.

In 1925, at the centenary celebration of Forty-second Street, Mr. Schoonmaker was the honor guest at a luncheon of the Forty-second Street Property Owners' and Merchants' Association, where he was greeted as the oldest merchant on Forty-second Street.

WIDE CHANGES SEEN IN SCHOOL BUILDING

Survey Shows Planning of Structures Has Become a Highly Technical Task.

MORE PROVISION FOR PLAY

Social Activities Also Stressed in Modern Programs—Choice of Sites Important.

According to a survey by the United States Bureau of Education the planning and erection of school buildings is becoming a highly technical task which demands the combined knowledge and skill of educators, health specialists, building and landscape architects, heating, ventilating, lighting and sanitation experts.

To determine to what extent this modern type of school building, with its variety of activities, particularly in elementary schools, is found throughout the country, the bureau recently made a study of school buildings in ninety cities in thirty-three States.

It was found that the modern school requires for its construction the combined skill of many persons. "Since the kind of school building to be erected depends upon the education to be carried out in it, there has to be close cooperation between the school authorities who plan the educational program and the architect," says a summary of the survey. "In the larger cities school architects who are part of the administrative staff of the schools, or are employed almost continuously on the planning of school buildings, give practically all of their time to the solution of the building problems.

Experts Are Engaged.

"In addition, the services of the landscape architect and heating, ventilating and lighting engineers are required. Experts in each of these fields are engaged on working out school-building standards. A steady progress is shown in the last few years in bringing together specialists, particularly with respect to the planning of high schools. Not so much work has been done on elementary schools, due probably to the fact that the additional facilities of the enriched curriculum of the elementary school are of comparatively recent growth.

"The recognition of the importance of having large sites for school buildings has come even later than the realization of the modern type of school building. When those who were responsible for the governing of our cities were men and women who had been brought up on the farm it was difficult to persuade them of the importance of providing large playgrounds for city children. They had always had adequate play space, and it was hard for them to realize to what an extent the city child had been deprived of opportunities for wholesome play. Now, however, that the men and women who are responsible for the administration of our cities are in many places those who have been born and brought up in cities, it is easier for them to realize the desirability of having adequate playgrounds for each school building.

"The literature upon school sites and playgrounds published in the past few years indicates that there is a growing consensus in regard to the school site on the following points: It should meet the recreational needs not only of the children attending the schools, but of the adults in the district served by the school; when possible, it is desirable to include in the site not only play ground space, but park space; care should be taken that the landscaping of the grounds should be beautiful.

Recent Radical Departures.

"The modern school building, which has been developed during the past twenty years, represents a radical departure from the school building of previous periods. Owing to changed social and industrial conditions, which have deprived children in cities of many of the educational activities which formerly existed in the community life outside of the school, the curriculum of the modern school has been enriched so as to give children much greater opportunities than formerly for a variety of play, handwork and social activities.

"The school building has had to be changed to meet these new educational demands. At the same time advances in the science of heating, ventilating, lighting and equipping school buildings are making it possible to prevent many of the health defects, i. e., bad posture, poor eyesight, respiratory troubles, &c., which developed in children as a result of the conditions in the older type of school building.

"The bureau found that of the elementary schools studied, 82 per cent had auditoriums, 60 per cent had gymnasiums, 75 per cent had special rooms and 74 per cent had kindergartens. It also was indicated that, although standards in regard to size and equipment of auditoriums, gymnasiums and special rooms were gradually being worked out, these matters were still in the experimental stage.

"The planning of the school site, its location, size, provision for playground facilities, gardens, &c., is now of equal importance with the planning of the building.

"The tendency to have school-building surveys preliminary to working out school-building programs appears to be one of the well-established techniques in the solution of the school-building problem."

FORESTRY CLUBS GROW.

Extensive Work Is Reported by Expanding Ohio Groups.

In one year's time extension workers in Ohio have made "two 4-H club foresters grow where but one grew before." Clubs in twelve counties of the State report 250 new members this year. Seven other counties have such clubs.

The new members, according to the Forest Service of the United States Department of Agriculture, last Spring planted 210,000 trees sent to them from the State nurseries at Wooster and Marietta, each member receiving enough two-year seedlings to plant an acre of land. On the farms of Trumbull County alone new forestry club members reforested sixty acres.

Now that planting is off the calendar for this year the clubs are busy with tree identification and with plans for forestry exhibits at county fairs. First-year requirements of a forestry club member include the identification of fifteen native forest trees of commercial importance in his home section.

PLANTING BEAUTIFIES BAY STATE HIGHWAYS

Massachusetts Supervises Setting Out Trees and Shrubs to Landscape Roadways.

To obtain the best results in roadside planting, individuals entrusted with such work should have a wide knowledge of vines, shrubs and trees, says James H. Taylor, highway landscape supervisor of the Massachusetts Department of Public Works, writing on progress in roadside planning in the August issue of Public Roads, a bulletin of the Bureau of Public Roads, United States Department of Agriculture. They should know the height and spread of the planting at maturity, and its possibilities of contrast in shape, texture and color with other planting, and also they should know what the planting looks like at different seasons of the year, and when and how to plant and how to care for all kinds of roadside development.

"We are educating a small army of men whose primary interest is in the road surface and whose natural attention is to lines and grades, 'pot holes' and breaks, tar barrels and side drains, and interesting them in vines, shrubs and trees and the esthetics of the roadside," Mr. Taylor says. "Responses differ as men differ; the result is not uniform, but the general tone is one of splendid cooperation.

"Depressions in the road surfaces are known to the road maintenance man as 'pot holes.' The roadside developer detects what may be called pot holes in the highway landscapes and corrects the situation, sometimes by filling in and sometimes by removing detracting or barrier material.

"All roadside pictures exist in three parts—foreground, middle-distance, and background. The planter must know the dimensional limits and contrastual possibilities in shape, texture, and color; bark, leaf, and flowers. He must know the Spring aspect, Summer maturity, Autumn glory and Winter value; in other words, he must have a complete knowledge of growing things.

"Trees carefully planted and cared for grow, but tend to become top-heavy with foliage. This requires intelligent removal of enough of the tops to give them a chance to resist wind pressure, not by mere shortening of the terminals, which produces four or five sprouts instead of one, but by the removal of entire branches, cutting them off at the outer edge of the collar of the limb. Proper pruning leaves the tree symmetrical.

"In Massachusetts, three tree crews are kept in operation throughout the year, each crew consisting of a tree agent and three men. Two of the crews are equipped with a camp wagon, a small house on wheels, fitted to house four men comfortably.

"Plantings in the main are confined to new right-of-ways, since their widths of sixty feet or more allow greater opportunity for landscape development. Such locations assure a reasonably undisturbed future, but it is a rule in every case to plant as near the property line as possible."

The planting procedure, says Mr. Taylor, is as follows: A blue print showing the right-of-way lines and road location is sent to the Palmer station, where the State nursery is located. The designer makes a study of the road and indicates the proposed planting on the blue print. The locations of plants or trees are then staked and the pits dynamited, dug, and where necessary refilled with the best loam obtainable.

Tree pits are three feet in diameter and three feet deep and shrub pits are two feet in diameter and two feet deep. The planting order is filled by the State nursery, packed on trucks and trailers, and set out in the field. A space three feet in diameter around each plant is grubbed and kept free from weeds, and water is supplied if needed. After the planting is well started a final inspection is given and it is turned over to the district maintenance forces for care.

"Trees should have constant and thorough inspection," Mr. Taylor warns, "for it often happens that a tree presenting a fair face to the road is merely a shell from the other side and is ready to fall with the first strong wind. Dead trees and limbs deface the picture; they are a menace to traffic and should be removed at once."

EXCAVATIONS BEGUN.

Steel Sheeting Is Being Used for Battery Tower Work.

Interlocking steel sheeting is being used in a new foundation process on Battery Tower, forty-story apartment hotel to serve the Wall Street area, according to Albert Mayer, president of Downtown Homes, Inc., the builders.

Excavation work has been started by Moran & Proctor, engineers, who will excavate all the way to bedrock in contrast to the usual method of digging to a limited depth and then sinking caissons to bedorck. The interlocking steel sheeting will prevent water seepage, Mr. Mayer stated.

The excavation work and sinking of the sheeting will be complicated by the fact that digging must go through cribbing and old docks known to be buried under the site, which is 56-66 Washington Street, through to 32-43 West Street. Sinking of piles for the west side elevated highway was halted temporarily last week when approximately forty feet of old bulkheads, sunken docks and ships were encountered, Mr. Mayer said.

HOOVER PLAN SEEN AS AID TO BUILDERS

Construction Industry Ready for Renewal of Activity Says John W. Harris.

REACTION IS WIDESPREAD

New Contracts Will Speed Up Labor Employment and the Production of Materials.

The emphasis which President Hoover placed upon the construction industry as a factor in maintaining prosperity through the development of steady employment of labor has met with enthusiasm among builders throughout the country, according to John W. Harris of the Hegeman-Harris Company, Inc., builders.

"The President's suggestion finds the building industry prepared to cooperate and will result in widespread renewal of activity," Mr. Harris said.

"The building industry is ready for a renewal of activity in all its departments. For the past two years, due to many conditions, one of which has been the diversion of mortgage funds to other channels, our industry has undergone a recession in the general market, so that it is in a splendid position to start on a building program of large proportions without disturbing the delicate balance between supply and demand.

"The fact is well established that the building business always has been an underlying and necessary factor of sound prosperity. The reasons for this would seem obvious. Highly paid men in large numbers are employed in our business. This favorable labor condition is found not only in actual construction operations on the job, but also runs far into many large and important industries. In addition to the major items of steel, brick and stone, cement and lumber, hundreds of other items enter into the construction of a building.

"Thanks to the prompt intervention of President Hoover and the cooperation of leading business men of the country, it seems to me that we are going to have an active market in our industry after the turn of the year. We are assured that there will be ample funds available for mortgage requirements and, no doubt, a great deal of the surplus of large industrial corporations, reported to have been earning large interest returns in the call money market, will flow back to these companies and find investment in long deferred construction work.

"Many great educational institutions, hospitals and other institutions will probably come into the market. It is well known that there is very pressing need all over the country for additional hospital facilities, public and private, and it is to be expected that there will be activity in this field. The public work, national, State and local, railroad and utility construction, roads and reclamation projects, added to construction projects, will develop a market that, it is estimated by the authorities will run into many billions of dollars."

SPECIALTY SALESMEN.

Here is an opportunity for three men who want to go in business for themselves, but who are prevented from doing so through lack of capital.

If you have initiative, willingness to work hard, a real ambition to succeed, and can handle and train men, there is an opening for you in this organization.

We furnish our men with every possible sales cooperation, use full page advertisements in the Saturday Evening Post, Ladies' Home Journal, Collier's, Literary Digest, Good Housekeeping, &c. and distribute all leads to our men.

We are one of the largest manufacturers in the country, rated AAA-1 in Dun's and Bradstreet's and have grown from an obscure company to an $18,000,000 corporation in the short span of 4½ years.

Our product is used and endorsed by the U. S. Government, State and Municipal Institutions, Public Utility Corporations, Steamships, Banks, Stores, Hospitals, &c. Prominent Medical Authorities are enthusiastic as to its hygienic merits.

Regardless of your present vocation or past experience, we can place you where your earning power will be far above the average. You will be required to sell in the field for a period of 30 to 45 days after which time you should be ready to assume the responsibilities of an executive position where the pay runs into big figures.

Our unusual plan of compensation of liberal advanced commission and bonus enables us to share in some of the highest salaries paid electric specialty organizations in America.

SPECIALTY SALESMEN
TO TRAIN FOR BRANCH OFFICE MANAGERSHIPS.

We are a large, well-financed manufacturing firm and national advertisers. Our product is entirely new in the labor-saving device field and sold to household, apartment, institutional and commercial buildings. Our field is enormous and the large volume of sales have already been developed by our men who are increasing their income 50% annually. This is not a job, this is your opportunity to get in on the ground floor. Drawing account against commissions if you qualify.

We are now expanding our direct selling organization through opening branch and subbranch offices in all principal industrial centers of the country; to road traveling necessary and no investment required, as we finance the opening of office. Territories are of sufficient area to provide for future growth.

You can fill one of these branch office positions if you are a high-calibre specialty salesman between the ages of 28 and 34, thoroughly experienced in demonstrating and selling mechanical specialties direct to the user and can show a successful sales background.

If you prefer to remain within fifty miles of New York City, satisfactory arrangements can be made.

To be successful requires both intelligence and hard work. Therefore we wish to interview only serious minded men, who are responsible and ambitious with an eye to the future. Write, telling all about yourself, your qualifications and products sold during last five years. All communications held strictly confidential. Interview arranged after letter indicates that you have the necessary qualifications for this work.

ADDRESS F. M., 43 TIMES.

STOCK, BOND AND SPECIALTY SALESMEN.

Everybody is interested in aviation, but most aviation financing has been accomplished heretofore through common stocks, because few aviation companies possess assets of a character permitting the application of proved principles of public utility financing. Aviation is no longer a three-ring circus—aviation is transportation, and transportation is a public utility. Unquestionably, the market for bonds and security investments is on the eve of a wide expansion. We are about to offer a 6½ per cent bond issue with stock purchasing rights, secured by equities in rapidly growing New York City close-in real estate. It is the first secured investment that we know of offered by any aviation corporation. It meets the new demands of investment trend as to security, plus full profit-sharing privileges.

If you can sell anything you can sell this bond. Your prospects and clients can see the property behind their bond—it is conveniently located near midtown New York City.

Liberal commission and unusual selling aids and cooperation.

Apply in person, Room 701, 60 Wall St.

ARE YOU, TOO, LOOKING FOR AN ENLARGED FIELD OF ACTIVITY?

Among the many types of men who have doubled and tripled their former incomes by taking up life underwriting work for The Equitable are salesmen, engineers, teachers, civil service workers, county farm agents, advertising specialists, merchants and store managers. Some business experience is desirable but not essential, nor is a knowledge of selling necessary, as The Equitable has special courses in salesmanship and training for all new representatives.

Life underwriting, on a commission basis, particularly for a billion dollar company such as The Equitable, has many opportunities for men of character and industry. Not only is an immediate and annually increasing income possible, but a permanent profession without age limitations is assured. The requirements as well as the advantages are set forth in a booklet which The Equitable will be glad to send you on request. Personal interviews also invited.

THE EQUITABLE LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY OF THE UNITED STATES,
Thomas I. Parkinson, President.

To The Equitable,
393 7th Av., New York.

SCARSDALE.
With commanding views, splendid elevation and accessibility and convenience.
An outstanding offering at $26,000.
In a community notable for its artistic homes, this fine example of modern English architecture is outstanding; it represents not merely a luxurious modern home but a substantial, sound investment, because of its location, the size of the plot and the high standard of construction and materials entering into it; there are 3 master bedrooms and 2 tiled baths on the second floor; maid's room, with bath, on first floor; the large living room, with its beamed ceiling, is particularly attractive; the house is so advantageously placed on the plot, 70x150, that space is available for a splendid playground; 2-car garage.
We consider this to be one of the real offerings of the year.
A list of present Scarsdale home opportunities will be sent upon request.
